There is a front yard on the back side of this Depot house, right against my window. Shoats, fatty in need of slaughtering lolling lazily in the sun; young tom-turkeys strut and exhibit long red noses; rank old horny goats and bleating kids gambol and buck against each other; the prototypes of chickens quadrupeds and fowls, may be seen on the hotel platform, right across the track. Foul birds will brood, roost, cuss and swear, and talk about matches, fast horses and dogs, and of the days when they are full of; and instead of clucking at their horses and whistling in their pups, they cluck at Tom and Rose and remark to the horses "hay!" Why don't they tell 'em "oats?" Squirts with long red noses and their hair parted behind, strut, turkey-like to and fro, and sometimes back up and gobble. Heavy old curmudgeons, rank in sin and speculation, sport long goatees, and upon their mouths and vacant intellectualities in kids who frisk and frolic and [illegible] and sport and bend against each other at Faro and other banks.

"Such is life!" All the world's a Depot House barn-yard; and the traveling men in it are mere swine, goats, tom-turkeys and the like. [Don't give me the part of Dogberry by writing me down an ass's pair off.]

This Ottumwa is the present terminus of the Burlington and Missouri Railroad, which meets with the Des Moines Valley Road right alongside the D. M. river. Mr. J. S. Wolf and his two brothers from Cedar Rapids or Chicago or some other village, have taken a contract to build sixty miles further of the B. & Mo. Riv. Road, due west to Pella, and are now working a small force and pulling for [illegible]. They are old and experienced men, and the work will go on with a strong pull, and eventually fetch up at either Nebraska City or Plattsmouth, something more than 200 miles away. The track on the Des M. V. Road is being laid at the rate of about 400 yards per day, north-westward from Pella, the present terminus, toward the capital. The next Hon. Legislature will only have to stage it one foot 36 miles from Monroe, the next time they go to enact laws and other iniquities. Pella, (a word derived from pre, pellet, or pell ell), has [illegible] inhabitants, [illegible] miles south of the Pelicans must turn over the road's bed to the Mormonites; who in their turn must needs turn over their bed again to other impatient waiters.

Des Moines river at this place is now about from 12 to 20 rods wide, on an average; and it so shallow that this morning I saw a great long string of emigrant wagons fording it just below the ferry. The bed of the river is flat, solid rock. (A Chippewa Indian would call it es canada.) Lime building stone quarries are digged near the shore lower down the river. Boats did once play on this river, when Iowa was an infant; yes, and many more times did they do it. And now betimes a steamboat of a craft comes puffing up, more for fun than for commercial gain. And, take her all in all, ten months in the year the Des Moines river is better adapted to sheep-washing, thirst quenching and baptismal purposes, than to navigation for paddle-wheels and per banks are bonnie [illegible] while those of the Skunk river, thirty miles east, are muddy, dark, pestiferous and in every way as foul as Chicago river.

I wish trans-Mississippi railroads were "endowed" with better rolling stock and more of it. Who likes to be smelled along in shocking odd passenger cars behind squealing and bellowing live stock? Who likes the odor or the melody thereof? Is it not bad enough to be compelled to ride in a mixed crowd of rather bad smelling emigrants, and several weeping babies, and sundry squalling babies, without having the [illegible] rest of the world as they dare to, and sotto-voce-ing the rest as long as they can make money by it, then letting them go to grass as quick as their influence is gone.

Put me in Superintendent of a Railroad if you would see the world as 'tis. I can beat Saxe or Cervantes at classifying humanity. Some old roadsters are trying to hit this idea of mine; but they never can fully do it until they let tickets graded in price according to the quality of the coach.

I scoot hence down to the Illinois Central Road.

Cries

KITTY NEIL.

BY DENNIS FLORENCE M'CARTHY

"Ah, sweet Kitty Neil! rise up from your wheel;
Your neat little foot will be weary from spinning
Come, trip down with me to the sycamore tree—
Half the parish is there; and the dance is beginning.

The sun is gone down, but the full harvest moon
Throws a glory on all the fair valley,
While all the air sings with the soft, loving things
Each little bird sings in the green shaded alley."

With a blush and a smile, Kitty rose up the while,
Her eye in the glass, as she bound her hair, glancing;
'Tis hard to refuse when a young lover sues,
So she couldn't but choose to go off to the dancing.

And now on the green the gay groups are seen,
Each gay hearted lad with the lass of his choosing;
And Pat, without fail, leads out sweet Kitty Neil—
Somehow, when he asked, she ne'er thought of refusing.

Now Felix Mugeo puts his pipes to his knee,
And with fourfah so free sets each couple in motion;
With a cheer and a bound, the lads patter the ground—
The sod shakes around them—they sweep on like ocean.

Then to light as the roe—feet light as the doe—
Now coyly retiring, now boldly advancing;
Search the world all round, from the sky to the ground,
No—there's no such sight can be found as an Irish lass dancing.

But oh! Kate, who could view your eyes of deep blue
Your dark flowing tresses, your daisy dimples so kindly—
Your fair throbbing arm, heaving breast, rounded form—
Nor feel his heart warm, and his pulse throb wildly?

Poor Pat feels his heart as he gazes, depart;
He feels it bound by the smart of such painful retaliation of love;
The sigh he leaves his eye, as he cries, with a sigh,
"Oh, I sigh for my Kate! for she thinks of your feet, love!"

Tom Rocket, the Highwayman.

BY ALBANY FONBLANQUE, JR.

"It happened to my father," said the tall man in the chimney corner, "and that's how I came to know all about it."

The chimney corner is that of the Rising Sun, a pleasant little roadside inn, about [illegible] miles from Southampton, and the tall man is president of a bowling club that meets once a fortnight, principally to dine. The club, of which the speaker's relative was the hero, is the adventure which forms the subject of this narrative.

The reason why we were listening to stories instead of playing bowls, was simply this. One of the heaviest thunder-storms that I can remember, broke over the Rising Sun that afternoon. All during dinner we could see great ragged copper-colored clouds banking up against the wind, and the cloth was hardly off the table, when spit! spat! spat! against the diamond-shaped window-panes came a few heavy hail-stones, then came the lightning, then came the thunder, and then came the rain, as though it had not rained for ten years, and was determined to make up for lost time. So there was nothing for it but to sit still and to amuse ourselves, as best we could, indoors; and the conversation having turned upon travelling, and the dangers of the road before railways were invented, Mr. Josh Sandiger, our president, sitting and smoking his pipe in the chimney corner, volunteered to tell us a tale of those times, and, said he, it happened to my father, and that's how I came to know all about it.

You don't think, I would like he to give you the story just as Mr. Josh gave it to us, you might get vexed with his pipe. He always smokes a very long clay pipe, which seems to require a great deal of management to get it to draw properly. He never says more than about six words at a time; then he has a pull at his pipe, and goes on again, giving you a whiff of words as well as a whiff of smoke, while [illegible] About [illegible] wandering [illegible] his pipe [illegible] into [illegible] his mouth and [illegible] the tobacco stopper, [illegible] then he takes [illegible] quiet, presses down the ashes [illegible] fully, and shakes them out on the hob; then he looks into it again, and if it is all right, he dips the shank end into his brandy and water, looks into the bowl a third time, and gives it a rub with his cuff. Next, he opens his mouth wide, puts the sealingwax end in its place, his lips upon it slowly, and then goes on again with his story, six words at a time as before. He is reckoned a very [illegible] speaker in these parts, is our president. And so, of course, he is. But, [illegible] his hearing, that all this fidgetting, these pauses, and pullings, and stoppings, and rubbings, and looking at nothing at all, in the middle of a story, [illegible] that Rogers that I [illegible] him, knock his pipe out of his mouth and shake at him to get on faster—that I do.

It would be as well, perhaps, then, if I were to quote his own words as nearly as I can recollect them straight on, and put his pipe out.

My father (continued Mr. Josh) used often to say he would like to see the man who could rob him upon the highway, and on one fine November evening he did see him. You young fellows who are accustomed to be whisked away a hundred miles between breakfast and your dinner by an express train, and grumble vastly if you are ten minutes behind time, don't know much about what travelling was in 1795—cross country travelling especially. Folks did not leave their homes then if they could help it. It's all very fine to talk about the beauties of the country, and the delights of a change of scene, but when there are more highway men than scavengers or police about, the roads are not so very charming. I can tell you. Why, it was a week's journey from here to London and back in those days, and if you got home with whole bones and a full purse, you were not in a hurry to tempt Providence and Tom Rocket a second time.

Tom Rocket was a highwayman. No one ever christened him Tom, and his father's name was not Rocket. When he was tried for his life at Warwick Assizes, we was arraigned as Charles Jackson, and they were particular about names then. If you indicted a man as Jim, and his true name was Joe, he got off; and when the law was altered—so that they could set such matters right at the trial—people, leastwise lawyers, said that the British Constitution was being pulled up, root and branch. But that's neither here nor there.

I cannot tell you how it was that he came to be known as Tom Rocket, and if I could, it would not have anything to do with my story. For six years he was the most famous thief in the Midland counties, and six years no one knew what he was like. He was a easy fellow, was Tom; he never came out except when there was a good prize to be picked up, and he had his scouts and his spies all over the place to give him information about booty, and warn him of danger. But to judge by what people said, he was "on the road" at half a dozen different places at once every day of his life; for you see, when any one was robbed of his property, or found it convenient so to account for it, why he laid it upon Tom Rocket as a sort of excuse for giving it up easily, because, you see, no one thought of resisting Tom.

So he had all sorts of conflicting descriptions of his person got abroad. One said that he was an awfully tall man, and that a voice like thunder; another that he was a little little man, with black eyes and a little [illegible]. He was a very fat man, with light eyes and black hair with some; he had a jolly red face—he was as pale as death—his nose was Roman one day, Grecian or a snub the next. His dress was all the colors of the rainbow, and as for his horse!—that was of every shape and breed that was ever heard of, and of a good many more beside, that have yet to be found out. He wore a black half-mask, but some how or other it was always obliging enough to slip off, so as to give each of his victims a full view of his face, only no two of them could ever agree as to what it was like.

My father was a Gloucestershire man. He stood six feet three in his stockings, and measured thirty six inches across the chest. He could double up a half-crown between his finger and thumb, and was as brave as a lion. So, many a time and oft, when any one talked of the dangers of the road, he would set his great teeth together, shake his head and say that he should like to see the man that could rob him on the highway; and, as I said before, he did see him, and it was Tom Rocket.

My father was a lawyer, and was at the time I have mentioned, engaged in a great tithe cause that was to be tried at Warwick Spring Assizes. So, shortly before Christmas, he had to go over to look up the evidence. There was no cross-country coach, so he rode; and being, as I have said, a brave man, he rode alone. He transacted his business; and my poor mother being ill, and not liking to leave her alone longer than he could help, he set out to ride home again, about half past nine o'clock that same evening. It was an beautiful a winter's night as ever you were out in. His hunting was a first rate hunter, double as a dog, and fit to carry even his weight over, or past anything. He had a brace of excellent pistols in his holsters, and he jogged along, humming a merry tune, neither thinking nor caring for any robber under the sun. All of a sudden it struck him that the pretty barmaid of an inn just out of Warwick town, where he had stopped to have a girth that he had broken patched together, had been very busy with those self-same pistols, and suspecting that she might have been tampering with them, he drew the charges and re-loaded them carefully. This done, he jogged on again as before.

He had ridden about ten miles, when he came to a wooden bridge that there was in those days over the Avon. Just beyond it rose a sullen hill, at the top of which was a sudden bend in the road. Just as my father reached this turn, a masked horseman suddenly wheeled round upon him, and bade him "Stand and deliver!" It was Tom Rocket! In a second my father's pistols were out, cocked, and snapped within a yard of the highwayman's chest; but, one after the other they missed fire! The pretty barmaid—a special favorite of Tom's—was too sharp to rely upon the old dodge of drawing the balls, or damping the charge; she thrust a pin into each touch-hole, and then broke it short off.

"Any more?" Tom inquired, as coolly as you please, when my father's second pistol flashed in the pan.

"Yes shouted my father in a fury, "one for your nob!" And seizing the weapon last used by the muzzle, he hurled it with all his might and main at Rocket's head. Tom ducked, the pistol flew over the hedge, and my father, thrown out of balance by his exertion, lost his seat and fell heavily on the grass by the road side. In less time than it takes to say so, Tom dismounted, seized my father by the collar, and presenting a pistol within an inch of his face as he lay, bade him be quiet, or it would be the worse for him.

"You've given me a deal of trouble," said Tom, "so just hand over your purse without any more ado, or by-O—! I'll send a bullet through your skull—just there," and he laid the cold muzzle of his pistol on my father's forehead just between his eyes.

It is bad enough to have to look down the barrel of loaded firearms when full cock, with a highwayman's finger upon the trigger; but to have the cold muzzle pressed slowly upon your head—ugh!—it makes me creep to think of it.

My father made a virtue of necessity, and quietly gave up his purse.

"Much good may it do you he said; "for there's only three-and-sixpence in it."

"Now for your pocket-book, said Tom, not heeding him.

"Pocket-book," inquired my father, turning a little pale.

"Aye, pocket-book," Tom repeated, "a thick black one; it is in the left-hand pocket of your riding-coat."

"Here it is," said my father, "you know so much about it that perhaps you can tell what its contents are worth."

"I'll see," Tom replied, quietly taking out and unfolding half a dozen legal-looking documents.

"They are law-papers—not worth a rush to you or any one else," said my father.

"Then," Tom replied, "I may tear them up," and he made as though he would do so.

"Hold! on your life!" my father shouted, struggling hard, but in vain to rise.

"Oh! they are worth something then," said Tom, with a grin.

"It would take a deal of trouble to make them out again," my father replied sulkily.

"—that's all."

"How much trouble?" Tom inquired with a searching look.

"Well," my father answered, "I suppose I know what you are driving at. Hand me them back, and let me go, and I promise to send you a hundred pounds when and where you please."

"You know very well that these papers are worth more than a hundred," said Tom.

"A hundred and fifty then," said my father.

"Go on," said Tom.

"I tell you what it is, you scoundrel," cried my father; "I'll stake five hundred against them if you'll lose your hold and fight me fairly for it."

Tom only chuckled.

"Why, what a ninny you must take me for" he said; "why should I bother myself fighting for what I can get without?"

"You're a cur, that's what you are," my father shouted in a fury.

"Don't be cross," said Tom, "it don't become you to look red in the face. Now attend to me," he continued in an altered tone; do you see that bridge? Well! there is a heap of stones in the centre, isn't there? Very good! If you place five hundred guineas in gold in a bag amongst those stones at twelve o'clock at night this day week, you shall find your pocket book and all its contents in the same place two hours afterwards."

"How am I to know that you will keep your word?" my father replied, a little softened by the hope of regaining, even at so heavy a price, the papers that were invaluable to him.

"I'm Tom Rocket," said the robber, securing the pocket book about his person, "and what I mean I say; and what I say I stick to. Now get up and mind," he added, as my father sprang to his feet, "my pistols don't miss fire."

"I shall live to see you hanged," my father muttered, adjusting his disordered dress.

"Shall I help you to catch your horse?" asked Tom politely.

"I'll never rest till I lodge you in a jail," said my father savagely.

"Give my compliments to your wife," said Tom, mounting his horse.

"Confound your impudence," howled my father.

"Good night," said Tom, with a wave of his hand, and turning sharp round he jumped his horse over the fence and was out of sight in a moment.

It was not quite fair of my father, I must own, (Mr. Josh continued after a pause), but he determined to set a trap for Tom Rocket, baited with the five hundred guineas at the bridge. He posted up to London, saw Bradshaw, a famous Bow street runner, and arranged that he and his men should come down and help to catch Tom; but just at the last moment, Bradshaw was detained upon some important Government trial, and so another runner, Frazer, a no less celebrated officer took his place.

It was settled that the runners should come by different roads, and all meet at a way-side inn about five miles from the bridge at 7 o'clock, P. M., on the day my father's pocket book was to be returned. An hour afterwards, they were to join him on the road three miles further on. Their object, you see, in taking this roundabout course, was to baffle Tom's spies and accomplices, and to get securely hid about the appointed spot long before the appointed time.

My father was a little late at the place of meeting; but when he arrived there he could see no one about, except a loutish looking countryman in a smock-frock, who was was swinging on a gate hard by.

"Good noight, master," said the yokel.

"Good night to to you," said my father.

"Can you tell me who this yer letter's for" said the yokel, producing a folded paper.

My father saw in a moment that it was his own letter to Bradshaw.

"Where did you get that?" he said quickly.

"Ah?" replied the yokel replacing it in his pocket, "that ud be tellin. Be ye expecting anybody?"

"What's that to you?" said my father.

"Oh, nought," said the yokel, "only a gentleman from London."

"Ha?" said my father; "what gentleman?"

"Will a name beginning with F. suit you?" asked the yokel.

"Frazer?" The word fell involuntarily from my father's lips.

"That's the name," replied the yokel, jumping down from his seat, and changing his tone and manner in a moment. "I'm Frazer, sir, and you are Mr. Sandiger, as has been robbed of a pocket-book containing valuable papers; and we are going to catch Tom Rocket as has got it—that's our game, sir. All right sir, and now to business."

"But where are your men?" asked my father, after Frazer had explained the reason for his disguise."

"All right again sir," said the runner, "they will join us. We have not much time to lose. So please lead the way."

So my father led the way, followed by Frazer; and by the time they came in sight of the bridge, they had been joined by four London officers in different disguises and from different directions. One appeared as a tramp, one as a pedlar, another as a gentleman's servant leading a horse, and the fourth as a soldier. No one could have guessed that they had ever met before, much less that they were engaged together in a preconcerted scheme. My father gave Frazer great credit for the dexterous way in which he had collected his forces.

The bridge upon which the money was to be placed, consisted of two arches across the river, and was joined on either side by a long sort of causeway, built upon piles over meadows that in winter time were generally covered with water. It so happened, that the very next morning after the robbery heavy rains set in, and soon the floods were out, so that there was no way of getting on the bridge, except by going along the causeway which extended a distance of a hundred yards, sloping down gradually to the road on either side of the river. This causeway was built of wood. At some places it was covered with earth and stones, but at others it was worn out and bare, so that a person looking from underneath, could see what was passing overhead. Mr. Frazer's sharp eyes took in the position at a moment. He got two hurdles out of a field close by, and with some excuse that he had brought for another purpose, fastened them to the piles so that they hung like shelves between the roadway and the flood, on either side of the bridge, and about twenty yards from it. This was his plan: two of his men, were to lie hidden on each hurdle, while he and my father, in a boat that was concealed beneath the main arch of the bridge, unseen themselves, could watch the heap of stones where the money was to be placed, and the stolen pocket book left in exchange for it. As soon as Tom Rocket or any of his friends removed the bag in which the gold was packed, Frazer was to whistle, and his men were to climb from their hiding places, and secure whoever it might be. If he leaped over the railing of the causeway, and took to the water, there was the boat in which to follow and capture him.

Mr. Frazer was very particular to practice his allies on springing quickly from their place of concealment, and in impressing on them and my father the necessity of all acting together, keeping careful watch and strict silence. "And now sir," said he to my father, as a distant clock chimed a quarter to twelve, "its time to get our places and to bait the trap, so please hand me the bag that I may mark it, and some of the coins so as to be able to identify them at trial." He had made up his mind, you see, to nail master Tom this time.

"My father gave him the bag, saw him write upon it, and make some scratches on about a dozen of the guineas, and then my father let himself down into the boat in which he was immediately joined by the runner.

"It's all right," said Frazer in a low tone.

"Do you think he will come?" whispered my father.

"Certain," replied Fraser, "but hush! we must not talk: time's up.

For three mortal hours did my father sit in that boat, and the runners lay stretched out upon the broad of their backs upon those hurdles watching for Tom Rocket to come for his money, and for three mortal hours not a soul approached the bridge, not a sound but the wash of the swollen river was heard. By the time that the clock struck three, my father, who had been nodding for the last twenty minutes fell fast asleep, as he sat covered up in his cloak, for it was a bitter cold night; but he was speedily aroused by hearing Fraser cry out that they were adrift.

Adrift they were, sure enough. The rope that held them had been chafed against the sharp corner of a pile, (so Mr. Fraser explained) and away went the boat, whirling round and round in the eddies of the river, fit to make any one giddy. So strong was the stream that they were carried a mile and a half down it before they could get ashore. My father was for returning directly to the bridge, and so was Fraser; but somehow or other they lost each other in the dark; and when my father arrived there, having run nearly all the way, he found to his great surprise that the officers had left. He rushed to the heap of stones, and there the first thing that caught his eye was his pocket-book—the money was gone!

Lord, how he did swear!

Determining to have it out with the runners for deserting their posts, he hurried on to the inn where they had met, and were to pass the night. He knocked at the door. No answer. He knocked again louder. No answer. He was not in the very best of tempers as you may guess. So he gave the door a big kick. In it flew; and a sight met his eye that fairly took away his breath. Tied into five chairs hand and foot, trussed up like so many Christmas turkeys, with five gags in their five mouths, and their eyes glaring at him owlishly, sat the real Mr. Frazer, and his four Bow street runners. Tom Rocket had managed the business at the bridge himself.

Upon examining his pocket-book, my father found all his documents, and a paper on which was wrritten these words:

By destroying these writings I could have ruined you. In doing so, I should have injured your client whom I respect. For his sake I keep my word, though you have played me false. TOM ROCKET.

Here Mr. Josh paused, and smoked for some time in silence.

"And what became of Tom?" asked one of the company.

"Well," replied Mr. Josh, "after having been tried three times, and getting off upon some law quibble on each occasion, he—who had robbed the worth of thousands of pounds and escaped—was executed at Nottingham for stealing an old bridle! And now I've done, gentleman all. I looks to—wards you."

So our worthy president "looked to—wards us," and finished his brandy and water at a gulp. Then finding that the rain had given over, we thanked him for his story, and all adjourned to the bowling green.

A good story is told of President Johnson and a tongue Albany politician, named Sam Tilden, who called on him recently:—Everybody who knows Sam Tilden knows that he is an intolerable bore. President Johnson knew it years ago. He therefore was disposed to indulge him and let him run loose. Tilden commenced by complimenting the President upon returning to old Democratic doctrines in his reconstruction policy, and bringing back the party to the Jeffersonian landmarks. He branched off, elaborating on his subject and illustrating it as only Sam Tilden can. He reminded the President that this was a compensating world, and illustrated his point by calling attention to the fact that while the peacock had a magnificent rainbow tail, the bird was good for nothing to eat—that the elephant was a collossal animal, but lacked the speed of the antelope. The President, all the time, sat biting his lip, wondering what the devil Tilden was driving at. Tilden continued:—"There, too, Mr. President, is the poor, stupid oyster: what a sweet morsel to roll under your tongue. But what a repulsive object to look at." The President here interfered, and taking the spectacles from his nose, quietly observed: "That there was one thing to be said in favor of the oyster, and that was, it knew when to shut up."

QUARRELLING.—If anything in the world will make a man feel badly, except pinching his fingers in the crack of a door, it is, unquestionably, a quarrel. No man ever fails to think less of himself after it than before. It degrades him in the eyes of others, and what is worse, blunts his sensibilities on one hand, and increases the power of passionate irritability on the other. The truth is, the more peaceably and quietly we get on, the better for our neighbors. In nine cases out of ten, the better course is, if a man cheats you, quit dealing with him: if he abuses you, quit his company; if he slanders you, take care to live so that no one will believe him. No matter who he is or how he abuses you, the wisest way to to let him alone; for there is nothing better than this cool, calm and quiet way of dealing with the wrongs we meet with.

TUMBLING PIGEONS OF INDIA.—It may interest some of your readers to hear of a very peculiar pigeon much valued by the Mussulmans of this country. It is called Lotan in Hindostanee, and its peculiarity consists of tumbling on the ground, instead of in the air. When required to tumble, they are taken in the hand, and the head slightly rubbed or "flipped" with the finger, and then they are put on the ground, when they continue to tumble until they are picked up. I have not seen them left on the ground until their tumblings are completed, being invariably taken up after they have tumbled about a dozen times. I should imagine that they might injure or exhaust themselves, if left longer. The pigeons are always white, and though their wings are long and pointed, but they seem to have small powers of flight. It is only lately I have heard of these pigeons, though seven years in India, but on inquiry, they seem to be not uncommon.

HOW TO BE MISERABLE.—Selfish people are generally fretful and unhappy, for true peace and joy are found only in imitating the character of Christ who went about doing good. Charles Kingsley in one of his sermons, has some good thoughts on this point: Think about yourself; about what you like, what you want, what people think of you, and then to you, nothing will be pure. You will spoil everything that you touch; you will make sin and misery for yourself out of everything that God sends you: you will be as wretched as you choose on earth or in heaven either. In heaven either, I say; for that proud, greedy, selfish, self seeking spirit would turn heaven into hell. It did turn heaven into hell for the great devil himself.

BABY'S GRAVE

BY MARY L. MASTIN.

It is just outside of my window,
I can see it where I sit,
With the drooping boughs of a willow tree
Bending over it.

"Only a baby's grave," they say
A foot or so of ground,
With the long grass waving in the breeze
And the flowers growing round.

And the marble stone at the head of it
Like a sentinel it stands
Over the form that lies beneath
With folded, sinless hands.

Only the baby. Ah, yes, I know
A bud of a single spring
Withered by summer's scorching sun,
So pure, so frail a thing.

But oh, the void that is in the home—
The weary, wasting blight
Since that ray of sunshine, so golden too,
Faded away in the night.

Aye, no! I am weary and sad at night,
And I almost long to be
Where my heart has buried, in baby's grave,
Under the willow-tree.

THE FARMERS' BAROMETER.—Take a common glass pickle-bottle—wide-mouthed; fill it within three inches of the top with water; then take a Florence oil-flask, removing the straw covering and cleansing the flask thoroughly; plunge the neck of the flask into the other bottle, as far as it will go, and the barometer is complete. In fine weather the water will rise into the neck of the flask even higher than the mouth of the other bottle, but in wet and windy weather it will fall an inch below the mouth of the flask. Before a heavy gale of wind, the water has been seen to leave the flask altogether at least eight hours before the gale came to its height. The invention was made by a German, and communicated by him to a London journal.

A good story is told of a prominent New York banker and politician. He is a somewhat passionate man, and considerably profane. Once he had a confidential clerk, at whom he blazed away one morning at a fearful rate. The man listened quietly till Belmont got through, and then said he would not stay and be sworn at, though he was a poor man. Belmont asked what he would remain for, and let him talk as he pleased. After thinking of the matter for a short time, the man said that if the salary were increased from $2,500 to $4,000, he would stand it. "You shall have it, d—n you," said Belmont, and the tradition goes not only that he gave the man the money, but never cursed him again at all.

THE Cedar Falls Gazette chronicles a remarkable illustration of the power of instinct in cattle, in the return to a farm in the vicinity of that town of two steers sold from said farm a year ago, wintered in Palo Alto county and thence taken westward with a freight train for Colorado. It is supposed that the steers gave out in the freight train, were turned loose to die, and walked to their old home, a distance of 600 miles.

LIEUTENANT MAURY, the rebel, has been naturalized by the imperial authorities as a Mexican citizen.

How Barnum Sold Bennett.

From the New York World

It seems that besides the offence to have been occasioned by the refusal of the ferlowned fat lady to pay her devoirs at the Imperial Palace on Washington Heights, other trouble was not long since brewed between Mr. Barnum and Mr. Bennett. The facts in relation to this newly fruited matter, may be briefly told: Mr. Bennett had some time back cast an eye—the affidavit does not set forth which of them—upon the piece of ground upon which the old Museum stood, diagonally opposite the Astor House. At the time of the fire, Mr. Barnum held a lease of his property for twelve years, which he, during the week after the conflagration, offered for sale through the agency of Homer Morgan Esq., for the round sum of ($225,000) two hundred and twenty five thousand dollars. Meeting Mr. Bennett one day, the fact that the property was in the market, was broached. Mr. Bennett asked the terms, and Mr. Barnum stated the price named above. Subsequently Mr. Bennett sent his pocket to Mr. Barnum with instructions to close a bargain if possible, on the best terms he could get. Meantime Mr. Bennett took care to secure a contract to purchase the fee of this property from its owner, Mr. Sargent, residing at Fishkill-on-Hudson, for the sum total of ($150,000) four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Mr. Bennett's broker, Mr. Duggan then closed the matter with Barnum, after beating him down a good sized peg, by purchasing the privilege of the lease for twelve years for two hundred thousand ($200,000) dollars cash, for which amount a check was duly tendered and accepted, and the usual acknowledgments made. A written agreement was given by Mr. Barnum, entitling the purchaser of the lease to the debris on the premises, with the exception of certain iron pipe, a boiler, a hundred tons of coal, and some other items that were considered as contents of the Museum, and not as part and parcel of the premises. In the course of a few days, it appears that the editor of the Herald grew sick of his bargain, or what is more probable, thought by feigning a disinclination to conclude the purchase of the fee, for which he held the refusal for a stated period, that Mr. Sargent might let it go at a more moderate figure. In this calculation, Mr Bennett found himself mistaken, for on sending word to Mr. Sargent that he had "concluded and to purchase," that accommodating gentleman said: "Very well. Mr. Bennett is at liberty to do as he likes;" and with that sailed for Europe without leaving his address, or offering to abate one jot or tittle from the large price named. This unexpected issue left the astute journalist in a predicament somewhat like that of the unlucky gentleman who won the elephant in a lottery—he had paid two hundred thousand dollars for an unavailable privilege. The situation vexed him. So to pick a quarrel, the brilliant editor lost no time in interfering with the removal of his old neighbor's hundred tons of coal, which had fortunately escaped being prematurely consumed in the general burning. Further than this, he threatened to sue Phineas for the old boiler already dug up from the ruins and carted off. Mr. Barnum, we believe, to save dispute, allowed his old friend, James Gordon to seize the coal intended to enhance the comforts of his giants, happy family, Albinoes and intelligent seal, during the long winter months, but when it came to being sued for pocketing his own boiler, his indignation got the better of his benignity. Phineas called on James' lawyer, and soon discovered that the way to appease the wrath of the illustrious type wielder, was to refund the two hundred thousand dollars, and take back the lease. This the benevolent Phineas would most unquestionably have done on the spot, but for the fact that he had spent the money. "Really, he had not the sum about him." He was not prepared to reconsider the bargain, particularly as on the whole, he seemed to be very well pleased with it. Next day the Herald appeared without the Museum advertisements. Then Barnum, as proprietor of the Great Broadway Show, sought a personal examination as to why these things were thus. It was not accorded to him.

The public knows where the rest of the laugh came in.

The prospects that the lessee of the eligible real estate at the corner of Broadway and Ann street, will permit the grass to grow thereon until the expiration of the twelve years, when he will be at liberty to realize what he can upon his extensive crop of hay. Meantime, he might permit our public spirited citizens to erect a statue of the "Gude Duke of Argyle," on his lone site just to keep the town in mind of how Barnum sold Bennett, and turnish an easy laugh when all else fails.

Counsel and Client.—A Case in Point.

"Well counsellor, once asked a notorious malfeasant who was under indictment and awaiting trial: "Well counsellor, what do you think of my case."

"I fear it's a pretty bad one," replied the man of law, shaking his head doleefully.

"How do you mean bad?" queried the malfeasant nervously.

"Well, if you must know, the charges in the indictment appear grave, and the proofs in support of them incontestible."

"Can't you deny the jurisdiction of the Court?"

"Not legally, I fear."

"Can't you have the indictment quashed for technical informality?"

The man of law shook his head.

"Can't you break down the evidence? I've dozens of fellows who will swear whatever my case may need."

"Unfortunately," resumed the counsellor, "the chief evidence against you is documentary, and in your own handwriting."

"Can't you have it stolen or destroyed before the trial? Can't you bribe the judge?"

"My friend," said the counsellor, rising indignantly and pointing to the door: "If you need such acts for your defence, go elsewhere for a lawyer."

The malfeasant was evidently abashed, and remained silent for some moments. At length a bright thought struck him and he leaped from his chair.

"As any rate, counsellor," he exclaimed, "you can abuse the plaintiff's attorney. You can charge that his second daughter squints, and that he drank more than was good for him the night his eldest girl got married."

"Capital!" exclaimed the nonplussed counsellor, much relieved. "Capital my dear fellow! you may rely on me to do it. All the evidence in favor of your innocence that can be given by establishing these charges, against the plaintiff's attorney shall be put in without fail and with a will."

They shook hands, then embraced, and then parted. Are there no other malfeasants in the present day, and are far from the City Hall, who appear reduced to relying—as lying is their nature—on just such a defence as this? They are glib to "abuse the plaintiff's attorney" but how does this answer the charges against them or blot away the evidence?

News of Sir John Franklin's Expedition.

Henry Grinnell, Esq., has received a letter which Mr. Hall wrote to Captain Chapel to be forwarded to Mr. Grinnell, from which we are permitted to extract:

WINTER QUARTERS IN IGLOO,
NORTH WOOD WEST END ROWE'S WELCOME,
Lat. 64.56 N., lon. 87.20 W.

Friday, Dec. 10, 1864.—I will give you briefly what the people of England and America will be most interested to learn. When I come down, I shall bring my despatches and journals up to the time of writing to you. These will be committed to your care for transmitting to the States. The most important matter that I have acquired, relates to the fact that there may yet be three survivors of Sir John Franklin's expedition—and one of these, Crozier, the one who succeeded Sir John Franklin on his death. The details are deeply interesting—but this must suffice till I come down: Crozier and three men with him were found by a cousin of Okeela (Albert), Shoo-she-ark-nut (John), and Aar-too (Frank) while moving on the ice from one igloo to another, this cousin having with him his family, and being engaged in sealing. This occurred near Netchille (Boothia Felix Peninsula). Crozier was nothing but "skin and bones" was nearly starved to death, while the three men with him were fat. The cousin soon learned that the three men had been living on human flesh—on the flesh of their companions who all deserted the two ships that were fast in the mountains of ice, while Crozier was the only man who would not eat any human flesh, and for that reason, he was almost dead with starvation. This cousin, (who has two names, but I cannot stop to give them now), took Crozier and the three men in charge. He soon caught a seal and gave Crosier a little—a very little piece, which was nearly raw—only one mouthful the first day. The cousin did not give the three fat men, anything, for they could well get along till Crozier was safe. The next day the cousin gave Crozier a little larger piece of the same seal. By the judicious care of this cousin for Crozier, his life was saved. Indeed, Crosier's own judgment stuck to him in this terrific situation, for he agreed with the cousin that he should only have a little piece the first day. When the cousin first saw Crozier's face, it looked so bad—his eyes all sunk in, his face so skeleton-like and haggard, that he did not dare to look on Crozier's face for several days afterward, it made him (the cousin) feel so bad. This noble cousin, whom the civilized world will ever remember for his humanity, took care of Crozier and his three men; save one, who died during the winter. One man, however died a short time after the cousin found them not because he starved, but because he was sick. In the spring Crozier and the remaining two men accompanied this cousin on the Boothia Felix peninsula to Netchille, where there were many Innuits. Crozier and each of his men had guns and plenty of ammunition, and many pretty things. They killed a great many ducks, nowyers, &c., with their guns. Here they lived with the Innuits at Netchille, and Crozier became fat and of good health. Crozier told this cousin that he was once at Innell-le (Repulse Bay,) at Winter Island, and Igloolik many years before, and that at the two last named places he saw many Innuits, and got acquainted with them. This cousin had heard of Pray; Ikmo and Crozier told his Innuit friends at Repulse Bay, some years previous, and therefore when Crozier gave him his name he recollected it. The cousin saw Crozier one year before he found him and the three men, where the two ships were in the ice. It was there that the cousin found out that Crozier had been to Igloolik.

Crozier and the two men lived with the Netchille Innuits some time. The Innuits liked him (Crozier) very much and treated him very kindly. At length Crozier, with his two men and Innuit, who took along a ki-ak (?) (an India rubber boat, as E-bierbing thinks it was, for all along the ribs there was something that could be filled with air), left Netchille to try to go to the Kob-la-na country, taking a south course.

When Ou-e-la (Albert) and his brothers, in 1854, saw his cousin that had been so good to Crozier and his men at Pelly Bay, (which is not far from Netchille,) the cousin had not heard whether Crozier, the two men and Netchille Innuit had ever come back or not. The Innuits never think they are dead—do not believe they are. Crozier offered to give his gun to the cousin for saving his life, but his cousin would not accept, for he was afraid it would kill him (the cousin,) it made such a great noise, and killed everything with nothing. Then Crozier gave him (the cousin) a long curious knife, (sward, as E-bier-bing and Too-kee-li-too say it is) and gave him many pretty things besides. [The dogs are all in harness, and sledges loaded, and Innuits waiting for my letters. I promise to be ready in thirty minutes.] Crozier told the cousin of a fight with a band of Indians—not Innuits, but Indians. This must have occurred near the entrance at Great Fish or Blank's river. More of this when I see you.

God bless you, C. F. HALL.

A COW THAT HELPED CONQUER THE REBELLION.—The New Albany (Ind.) Ledger gives the following: "At the Agricultural Fair at Charlestown a certain cow, decorated with blue and red ribbons, was the observed of all observers. She was captured from the rebels by Sherman's army, near Corinth, Mississippi, in the summer of 1862, and has accompanied the army in all its marches, raids and expeditions from that time up to the final disbandment of the army at Washington. She is property of General Clark, of New York, who, expecting to go on duty at New Orleans, had his gifted cow sent westward, with a view of taking her to his new field of duty. But the General being ordered back to New York, the cow will be sent thither and placed in the great Central Park. This cow, during all her journeyings through Mississippi, Tennessee, Georgia, South and North Carolina, and Virginia—a period of three years—has never ceased to give milk, averaging three gallons a day, which she still gives. She is certainly a noble animal, and wears her ribbons gracefully. She is now in the care of Mr. George W. Lee, of Clark county."

A RELIEVED HUSBAND.—We extract the following little sketch from Barry Gray's new book, "Matrimonial Infelicities."

"My wife has gone to visit her mother. I am happy to be able to state that the children accompanied her. Peace, quietness and felicity reign in my dwelling. I come and go unquestioned. I stay out late nights without fear of rebuke. I lie abed of mornings, and no one insists on my getting up. My friends pass the evening with me and there will be none to tell me the next day that the window curtains are filled with tobacco smoke, and the parlor has the fragrance of a bar-room. If two or three friends come home to dine with me, the cook never asks why I brought them, or complains of a headache. What is more, she does not insist on having a new silk dress every week or being late to ours if I utter rude and naughty words. The fact is, if there be one thing that I like more than another, it is to have my wife visit her mother."

—A stranger came to Albany to buy grain to stock a store in Massachusetts, where he had been in business six or seven weeks, having removed there from the State of Illinois. He had about $2,000 in his pocket, was tempted to try his chances at throwing dice, and kept on until he put up $500 to win back what he had lost, and got nothing. Another $500 was up and nothing won. When he stopped he had lost $1,500, and had $400 left. Greeny got $300 back by an appeal to the police, and left town forthwith.

A REMARKABLE TREE.—The Moniteur, in giving an account of the Emperor's recent visit to the Jardin d'Acclimation at Algiers, stated that he was much struck with the rapid growth of the Eucaplytus Resinifera, or Australian tree, which has attained a height of thirty feet and a diameter of six inches in two years. This remarkable tree, in its native soil, Australia, sometimes reaches the height of 340 feet and has been found more than nineteen feet in diameter at about a yard from the ground. It often yields planks 200 feet long without a single defect. The wood, notwithstanding its rapid growth, is very hard and heavy. It also presents beautiful colors, and is consequently well adapted to cabinet work. An astringent gum, known in commerce as kino, is obtained by making incisions into its bark. The Eucaclyptus is an evergreen; its leaves have nearly the same shape as the laurel. The development of its lateral branches are no less wonderful than its stems. They are small until the trunk attains the height of about 100 feet, when they shoot out almost horizont

THESE Bitters are prepared, in pure Bourbon Whiskey, from a combination of over twenty different kinds of roots, barks and herbs, which act in perfect concert one with other, prepared from the original formula given by the great celebrated Red Jacket, to Dr. Chapin, who used them successfully in his practice for many years, and by their use gained so great a popularity in the treatment and cure of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Constipation, Sick and Nervous Headache, Fever and Ague, and all diseases arising from torpid liver or indigestion. Persons suffering from either of these loathsome diseases will find a sure cure by the use of these Bitters, which are perfectly pure and free from all those drugs and poisons usually put up in such preparations and palmed off on an unsuspecting public. A single trial will convince the most skeptical that in the RED JACKET there is virtue which no other Bitters possess.

They strengthen and invigorate the system.
They are unequaled for general debility.
They are a sure cure for dyspepsia.
They give a good and healthy appetite.
They assist digestion.
They are the best stimulant in existence.
They are a preventive of Fever and Ague.
They relieve constipation.
They cure Nervous Headache.
They are perfectly pure and palatable

Aged persons and delicate females will find they can save large doctor's bills by the use of these Bitters.

Beware of counterfeits. The Red Jacket Bitters are only sold in bottles with our name blown on the side, and our private government stamp across the cork.

—OUR—

For Medicinal and Table use, which are perfectly pure, and need only be tried to be appreciated. None genuine unless they have our gold label on each bottle, and our initials pressed in wax over the cork.

Child Taught.

BY MRS. M. F. TUCKER.

Came my little daughter Ada,
With her laughing sister Grace,
Leaning lovingly upon me,
Looking up into my face:
And with tender tones they whispered
"What is mamma grieving for?
Are you then so very sorry
They are coming from the war?"

"Oh my children! little children!
You can hardly understand
Why I weep at the returning
Of this brave heroic band
They are those your father gathered,
They are those your father led;
But to-day he is not with them,
Oh, my darling, lying dead!

I was thinking of the brightness,
And the promise of his youth:
Of his rare and manly beauty,
Of his tenderness and truth.
Of the loyal heart and loving,
Of the generous and brave,
Of the hope and the ambition
Lying buried in his grave.

I was thinking how he hurried,
With his armor gleaming bright,
To the fiercest of the conflict,
To the thickest of the fight!
How his valient arm was lifted
In the battles of the free;
Oh, my darling! my lost darling!
Who will never come to me!

How I watched and how I waited,
How I wept and prayed for him,
When the moon hung out her silver,
When the stars were growing dim.
How I watched and how I waited,
How I prayed for him in vain;
For my darling—oh my darling!
Who will never come again!

Little Ada's face grew graver,
(She is thoughtful for her years)
And adown upon my bosom
Fell the shower of her tears.
But said blue eyed Gracie smiling,
"Other papa's come to-day,
Come to love their little children
Shouldnt we be glad for they?"

Quick I read the simple lesson,
Saw my selfish grief was vain;
And resolved that moment never,
Never thus to eer again.
Though for us the grief wind bloweth,
Though the trouble-tide we stem,
Other hearts, thank God; are happy,
And we will be glad for them.

From how many care-worn faces
Will the tears be wiped away!
To how many lonely dwelling's
Will the sunshine come to-day!
Then, oh soul! thy woes forgetting,
Join the welcome of the free,
Though our darling lieth buried
By, the far off Tennessee.

The Execution of Champ Ferguson.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Oct. 20.

The notorious Champ Ferguson was hanged to-day. The execution was strictly private. He died game on the gallows evincing no emotion until the rope was placed around his neck, when his face turned very red, and he broke out into a profuse perspiration, attended with strong quivering of the lips. He stood composedly on the drop some twenty minutes, while the charges, specifications and sentence were read by Col. Shafter. He nodded recognition to several persons in the crowd, and shifted his position in an impatient manner several times while the sentence was being read. To some specifications he inclined his head in assent; to others he shook his head. That about Alan Huddleston caused him to say, "I can tell it better than that." When the speaker read, "To all which the prisoner pleads not guilty," he said, "I don't now."

After prayer by his spiritual adviser, he was asked if he had anything to say before proceeding with the execution. He replied: "Nothing to say particularly at all—no, not that I know of."

The noose was then placed around his neck, when, for the first time, he gave signs of emotion, and his face blushed a deep scarlet. The perspiration broke profusely from his face and his lips closed with a convulsive quiver. The realization of his awful situation seemed to have flashed over his mind in all its fullness, overpowering his fortitude. Col. Shafter wiped the sweat away, and the prisoner gradually recovered his equanimity. He expressed himself much opposed to having anything placed over his eyes when a handkerchief was called for. Then he volunteered the statement, "I don't know some things in those specifications, but I don't deny anything I have ever done." For a moment or two he seemed to be repressing an impulse to make fuller remarks. After a brief pause, he added, "I want to be sent to my family, I don't want to be buried in this soil." After another pause, he continued in an excited tone, "Don't give me to the doctors, I don't want to be cut up here." Col. Shafter answered, "You shan't Mr. Ferguson. A short silence followed, when the prisoner again spoke; "I want to be put in that thing" pointing to the coffin, "and taken to White county, where I can have my family around me. If I had only had my way, I wouln't have been here. Whenever you are ready, I am done. My last request is that I may be sent away with my wife." His last words were, "O Lord, have mercy on me, I pray thee."

At seven minutes to 12 o'clock the drop fell, and life was extinct in 16 minutes.

—Mr. N. Davenport, near South Bend, Ind., undertook to fill a kesosene lamp while lighted, when the oil in the can ignited and exploded, burning him so severely as to cause death, and injuring his mother so she had to suffer amputation of an arm. We publish something like half a dozen accidents of this kind weekly. When will people learn that kerosene is as dengerous, almost as burning fluid?

He shouted until he was hoarse, and tried every means to extricate himself from his predicament, but it was all in vain; and he remained until morning, when he was seen by a passer by, and relieved from his awkward position more dead than alive. He soon recovered, and beyond a stiff back and a few twinges of rheumatism, is as well as ever.

HAD HIM THERE.—A rather amusing incident occurred on the streets on Friday last says the Chicago Tribune, in which a shoeblack contrived at once to show off his wit and turn an honest penny. A man apparently and undoubtedly from the country, was accosted by the juvenile polisher of begrimed understandings with the usual question. The following was the colloquy:

"Black yer boots, sir?"

"No."

"Shine 'em up for a dime!"

"No."

"Black 'em for five cents!"

"No."

"I'll do 'em for nothing!"

"All right."

The young hopeful set about his word with great relish and soon had one boot in bright, shining condition. Then turning up his face to the blackee, he gravely announced, "Now you'll have to give me a quarter to do the other."

That boy will yet be somebody.

HE TOOK THE PAPERS.—"Sir," said a ponderous personage who undertook to bully an editor, "do you know that I take your paper?" THE only person left to perpetuate the name of Daniel Webster, is his grandson, Ashburton Webster, a son of Fletcher Webster, who is a very promising young man, now in the American navy. Fletcher Webster left two sons and a daughter, the last still living. Edward Webster, major, who died in Mexico, left no children. There are four other grandsons by his much beloved Julia, bearing the name of Appleton. This is all of the family of Daniel Webster. A Boston paper has the following about the tomb of the latter at Marshfield. "When the son of Fletcher Webster was buried the other day, his grandfather's coffin was again opened, and the remains found in a perfect state of preservation. There is a secret about it; but those features will never be seen again."

Her maiden name was Tookolito.

KETCHUM, the forger is still confined in the Tombs, and bears his fate with remarkable resignation and calmness. He continues to play the role of injured innocence, but declares with some emphasis, he is too proud to complain. His wife, it is said, has not visited him; but two or three of his fair friends in whom he was more interested than he should have been, make frequent calls at his prison quarters, consoling his captivity with their caresses and softening it with their tears. He passes much of his time in reading poetry, and indicting sentimental epistles to the dear divinities I have spoken of; while he is the frequent recipient of various perfumed, rose-lined billets assuring him that in the midst of adversity the loving heart remembers most. His cell, if it can called such, is quite pleasant, and he is liberally supplied with books and delicacies and flowers. He has no doubt whatever of his discharge by the courts, and continues to asseverate that he has done nothing which can make him amenable to the law; that his "financial operations" were unfortunate, but sanctioned by custom in Wall street.

GEN. GRANT, THE GUARD AND HIS CIGARS.—On Gen. Grant's return to Washington from his two months' tour, he called at the White House in citizen's clothes. A dispatch says much amusement was created by a Lieutenant of the guard not knowing him, and asking him to remove the inevitable cigar.

GREELEY FISHING.—Nearly everybody has seen in the papers the remark lately made by Horace Greeley, that he had been trying for 30 years to get time to go a fishing, but without avail. Well, Greeley has "had his time." While in this city last Saturday, he rode out with a party of gentlemen, including the writer hereof, and tried his hand in trouting. The old Philosopher enjoyed the sport wonderfully—entering into it with all the spirit and eagerness of a school boy. Grasshoppers were used as bait, and Mr. Greeley assisted in catching them, using his somewhat dilapidated hat to considerable purpose—much to the amusement of the party. Mr. Greeley's luck was rather poor, as he did not catch a trout, but consoled himself with the remark that he could "take a fried one as well as anybody," which he demonstrated at dinner, on returning.—Hudson Star.

EX-PRESIDENT JEREMIAH DAY of Yale College, and author of numerous mathematical works, who is now in his ninety-third year, was in Hartford the other day, and astonished some of his friends by walking all about the city and up Asylum Hill. The old gentleman prefers his feet to any other mode of locomotion.

VENTILATE YOUR CHILDREN'S ROOMS.—Most parents, before retiring to rest, make it a duty to visit the sleeping rooms of their children. They do so in order to be satisfied that the lights are extinguished and that no danger is threatening their little ones. But if they leave the room with closed windows and doors, they shut in as great an enemy as fire, though his ravages may not be so readily detected. Poison is there, slow but deadly.

Morning after morning do many little children wake weary, fretful and oppressed.

"What can it mean? What can it be?" the mother cries. In despair, she has resource to medicine. The constitution becomes enfeebled and the child grows worse.

The cause, perhaps, is never traced to overcrowded sleeping rooms without proper air; but it is nevertheless the right one. An intelligent mother, having acquainted herself with the principles of ventilation, will not retire to her own room for the night without having provided a sufficiency of air for her children in the same manner that she provides and regulates their night covering, or any other requisite for refreshing slumber. Sometimes by judiciously lowering a window, and at other times by leaving a door wide open, this end may be attained.

HUMOR.—The Chicago Journal commences a lengthy "plea for good humor," as follows:

"Our readers have remarked that we sprinkle our columns with things humorous as well as things grave and substantial. We do this on purpose, and with a purpose. We believe in "running" the cheerful, as well the cloudy side of human affairs. Life is sober, the times are stern, people are grave or mad. There is little jollity in America. It's the all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy, which predominates in the American disposition. Leisure is rare, sport is rarer and laughter rarer than all. Gravity beclouds the countenances on the streets. Men look sober, and women sad. Business! Business! There is no end to business. The social circle is broken up, home is a remembered dream. Men and women meet occasionally, and but to bow and say good bye.

ART OF NOT QUARRELING.—Sensible husband: "How is that we never quarrel, Mr. Xantippe?" Well, I will tell you. One person can't make a quarrel. Now, if I am in a quarrelsome humor, and break out, my wife remains cool and collected and don't say a word. If my wife is peevish, and displays more temper than is becoming to one of her beautiful sex, I, her husband, remain as unmoved as the monument, or else cheat myself into the belief that I am listening for the moment to some heavenly song. We only quarrel one at a time, and it is astonishing, if you leave a quarrel alone, how very soon it dies out? That's our secret, madam; and I should advise you and all Xantippes to follow it.

A QUESTION IN PASTRY.—A sub-committee of a school board was examining a class in a primary school. One of the committee, to sharpen up their wits, propounded the following question:

"If I had a mince pie and should give two-twelfths to John, and two-twelfths to Harry, and two-twelfths to Isaac, and keep half the pie myself, what would there be left?"

There was a profound study among the scholars, but finally one of them held up his hand as a signal that he was ready to answer.

"Well sir, what would there be left? Speak up loud, so that all can hear," said the committee man.

"The plate," shouted the hopeful fellow. The committee man turned red in the face, while the rest of the members roared aloud. The boy was excused from answering any more questions.

AN AWKWARD COMPLIMENT.—A wedding breakfast was recently given by a substantial farmer blessed with five daughters, the eldest being the bride, when a neighbor, a young farmer who was honored with an invitation, thinking, no doubt that he ought to say something smart and complimentary on the event, addressing the bridegroom said: "Well you've got your pick of the batch." The countenances of the four unmarried ones, as may be imagined, looked awfully indignant.

A DANGEROUS CASE.—Some twenty years ago, a farmer's barn in the vicinity of Worcester, was struck by lightning, and burned to the ground. Many of the citizens had gone to the fire, when a fop, well strapped and dickied, with a cap on one side of his head, met a celebrated doctor, and accested him in this wise:

"Can you, ah tell me doctah, how fah they have succeeded in extinguishing the conflagration ah, of the unfortunate yeoman's barn?"

The doctor eyed the individual attentively dropped his head as usual for a moment, and then slipping his thumb and finger into his vest pocket, took out a couple of pills and handed then to him saying:

"Take these sir, and go to bed, and if you do not feel better in the morning, call at my office."

THE DIFFERENCE.—A philosophical cabman in Mobile, thus speaks of the section over which his wheels make their tracks: "If you run over a younger down here in this hereward," said he, "the folks don't say nothin'—kase they have got more children than wittles for 'em—but just run over a goat or a pig, and I'm blest if a mob ain't arter you in two minutes!"

THE AMOUNT OF HIS BILL.—The Continental folks a day or two since, hearing of the whereabouts of a guest who had decamped without going through the usual formality of paying his bill, sent him a note: "Mr. ——: Dear Sir.—Will you send the amount of your bill and oblige," etc. To which the delinquent made answer: "The amount of my bill is $80,62½. Yours respectfully."

WHY SHE MARRIED.—A young widow was asked why she was going to get married so soon after the death of her first husband. "Oh la!" said she, "I do it to prevent fretting myself to death on account of poor Tom."

Ships from Chicago to New York.

Mr. S. DeWitt Bloodgood is the author of a pamphlet proposing a ship canal to connect the great lakes with the harbor of New York. He takes the ground that there is so great an increase of Western and Canadian productions which seek access to tide-water, that it is absolutely necessary that the New York canal facilities should be enlarged.

Lake Superior is connected with Lake Huron by the Sault St. Marie canal. Lake Erie is connected with Lake Ontario by the Welland canal. The St. Lawrence canal connects Ontario with the sea. But there is another lake not yet connected with its fellows—Lake Champlain. Yet the barriers which isolate it, are easily removed. The lake affords a ship navigation of one hundred and twenty five miles and its course is from the direction of the St. Lawrence towards the Hudson.—The project of Mr Bloodgood is almost altogether an enlargement of the works already in existence. At the northern end of the lake, the Chamblee canal is already in operation. At the Southern end the Champlain canal unites the lake with the Hudson river. Even now a vessel of one hundred and twenty tons can sail from Chicago to the Hudson. In 1849, a convention was held in Saratoga, for the purpose of building of a ship canal from Lake Champlain to the St. Lawrence. In 1855 the project was approved by Mr Chabot, Canadian commissioner of public works, and by Mr. John B. Jervis, of New York, connected with the Erie canal and Croton water-works. The cost of the work was estimated at $4,000,000. The navigation of the lake is complete. Between it and the Hudson there is a canal 66 miles long, ascending 55 feet from the lake to the Summit level, and thence descending 125 feet to the Hudson. Mr. W. B. Taylor, estimated the cost of this canal at $3,770,000. This sum could build it so that it would be adapted to gunboats 150 feet in length, 25 feet beam and 8 feet draught. Mr. Jervis estimated that the cost of the improvement, and that of the Hudson for twenty miles below Troy, at $8,000,000. Since then the upper Hudson has been improved. In 1863 the engineer of the state of New York showed that the channel of the river might be easily and permanently improved at a moderate cost, upon the plan which has been so successfully adopted upon the Clyde in Scotland; by which vessels such as the largest class of Cunard steamers—the Scotia, Persia and Cuba—are enabled to reach Glasgow. In fact these vessels were built in the shipyards of that city.

It appears that, in the last ten years 1,287,861 tons, or more than one fourth of the tonnage of the Erie canal, passed over the Champlain to the Hudson. Gov. Seymour brought the plan to the notice of the legislature of New York in his last message. The completion of this work in the chain of water communication between the west and the east, would put down the present rates of freight, and of course, tend materially to the development of our agriculture and commerce. We want all the competition we can have between the Northwest and the sea. Mr. Bloodgood's plan is evidently one which for its feasibility recommends itself to the commercial community, especially to that of the state of New York, whose interest it is to attract much of the western trade as it can.

Another Atlantic Cable.

Another scheme of Atlantic telegraph communication has been brought before the public by a Spanish engineer, one Senior Arturo de Manoartu. The route which he suggests, is from Lisbon to Cadiz, through the Canary or Cape Verde islands, St. Paul to Cape St. Roque, Cayenne, and thence along the Carribean range to Key West, there to be merged into the American Telegraph system.

The advantage of this line would be that it would not be a monopoly under the control of one government, as the Irish and Newfoundland telegraph would have been. The line would leave the most western portion of Europe, which is Spanish, and join the most eastern portion of America, which is Brazilian. This line from Cape St. Vincent in Europe to Cape San Roque in America has the advantage of passing by many important islands, and by various capes and banks favorably situated for the subdivision of the length of the line into short sections—shorter, indeed, than many of lines already established between other points.

The projector declares that he has the proper concessions from the governments interested, and that he expects to be able before long to commence operations.

WILD OATS.—The following charming piece of word-music, from McMillan's Magazine, is probably from the pen of the celebrated novelist, Miss Muloch:

When all the world is young, lad,
And all the trees are green,
And every goose a swan, lad,
And every lass a queen,
Then fly for boot and horse, lad,
And round the world away,
Young blood must have its course, lad,
And every dog his day.

When all the world is old, lad,
And all the trees are brown,
And all the sport is stale, lad,
And all the wheels run down,
Creep home and take your place there,
The spent and maimed among—
God grant you find a face there
You loved when you were young.

THE LETTER OF THE LAW.—Bob Cone, a newly-elected sheriff, was told by the judge to open court. Bob went to the door and shouted—

"I call court! I call court!"

"Call W. H. Jones and A. P. Moore," said the judge.

"W. H. Jones and A. P. Moore—W. H. Jones and A. P. Moore!" yelled Bob.

"One at a time, Mr. Sheriff."

"One at a time—one at a time!"

"Now you've fixed it."

"Needn't come; we've fixed it!" screamed the determined sheriff.

There was no court that day.

COLUMBIA, THE GEM OF THE OCEAN.—A correspondent of the Missouri Democrat calls attention to "a very singular and hitherto unheeded blunder in the commonly sung and printed wording" of the song, "Columbia the Gem of the Ocean." The first stanza is always worded thus:

"O, Columbia the gem of the ocean,
The home of the brave and the free;
The shrine of each patriot's devotion,
A world offers homage to thee.
Thy mandates make heroes assemble,
When Liberty's form stands in view,
Thy banners make tyranny tremble,
When borne by the Red, White and Blue."

The fifth and sixth of the above lines are untrue in fact, and a libel on Republican patriotism. Our heroes assemble voluntarily "when Liberty's form stands in view;" they need no "mandates."

"THE DECEITFUL FLORENTINE."

A BALLAD.

There was a fine young mariner who sailed upon the sea,
His ship it was a ship of war—a lieutenant was he;
He was a man of gallant mien, and not unknown to fame,
Of high Italian parentage, O'Reilly was his name.

This noble young Italian man made love to Anna Lee,
He said that he did worship her; and she did worship he;
But Anna her thought sailor men were said to fickle be,
And she cried: "O, noble Florentine, I ask a pledge of thee!"

Then spoke this noble Florentine: "My love is ever warm;
Take this 'ere button I have cut from off my uniform,
For why, it is the only one, our noble President
And werry noble Commodore permits us to present."

With these deceitful words straightway he sailed across the sea,
And stopped awhile at Limerick (a town in Italy;)
And there, forgetting of his vows, and of his former flame,
He married an Italian girl, O'Connelly by name.

When Anna Lee received the news, she gave a frightful start,
And said: "You naughty, naughty man, methinks you've broke my heart."

And then she took a pistol up, but for a ball of lead,
Down deep into the deadly tube, HIS BUTTON rammed instead.

She shot herself; and maidens all, oh, listen unto me!
Don't trust too much in Florentines whose name is O'Reilly.
Don't trust to sailors, and if you would save your sinful souls,
Be careful when and how you make such awful button-holes!

NAPELUS.

Grandfathers and Grandmothers.

To my thinking, the most interesting periods of human life, are the two extremes—infancy and old age. There is nothing on earth, so pure, so beautiful, so innocent, so kissable as a bright-eyed, laughing, dimpled baby; nothing except a very old man, sans eyes, sans teeth, sans taste, sans everything but a sound conscience and a good heart.

I often wish that Shakspeare had not put that speech-picture of life into the mouth of Jacques. Jacques was a melancholy man, and took a melancholy view of things. If he had not been a misanthrope, a baby might have presented itself in his mind as chuckling and crowing in it's nurse's arms, instead of mewling and puking. In like manner he might have drawn a pleasant picture of a green and happy old age, instead of insisting so much upon leanness and slippers and shrunken shanks. The seven ages, as Jacques depicts them, may be in accordance with a certain rule of life; but, for my part I have met with many a beautiful exception, and I love to dwell on them. It has been my good fortune to know many old men, who, after the toil and strife of life, retained all the innocence and simplicity of their early childhood. I have seen them—and I can see them now—sitting in their easy chairs, their gums as innocent of teeth and their heads as innocent of hair as when they lay in their mothers' laps—sitting there biding the Lord's good time patiently and cheerfully, while sons and daughters and grandsons and granddaughters hovered about them and patted them and smoothed their pillows, and spoke to them in those simple words which seem as well adapted to the old man as to the child. There is a purifying influence in old age which we all recognize. We know that the old man has led a sinful life, but when old age comes upon him, wrinkling his brow, blanching his hair and bowing him to the earth, it seems as if he had been purified by time. I can understand why the patriarchs prayed so frequently and earnestly for length of days; prayed for life until the passions and the vanities of human nature should have passed over like a cloud, leaving the heart to beat its last throb on the peaceful shore of eternity. It always seems to me that at fourscore a man is neither in this world nor the world; he is in a position between the two, and can look calmly upon both.

I wonder if I am right in my impression that very old men are generally cheerful. I hope I am; for I love to think so. It is pleasant to believe that human nature can work out its own purification on earth, and return to its original innocence, with only such sips on its head as it cannot help, and is not accountable for. Right or wrong it is the impression that most of us have of persons in extreme old age. We fondle them as we fondle children, we talk to them as we plead them about by the hand as their parents talked to them when they were first learning to walk. They need help and care now just as they needed them then. There is grandfather sitting in his chair by the fire, seeing things dimly, hearing things vaguely, as he saw and heard from his mother's knee. And as we sit by and talk of him as if he did not hear us and understand what we say. "Poor old grandfather," we say, looking towards him: "he is failing very much. He can't see to read now, even with his specs and that is a great deprivation to him. But he is cheerful for all that. Ain't you, grandfather, dear?"

And the dear old baby knows by the sound of your voice and the look you direct toward him, that you are addressing him. And he endeavors to guess your meaning, and says something in reply, accompanying it with a pleasant chuckle to signify that he is quite happy.

He drops his handkerchief or his spectacles, just as a baby drops its spoon or its ivory ring, and you go and pick them up and put them back into his old hand, patting him on his bald head, and making him comfortable in his chair. As he sits there mumbling and gazing with his viewless eyes into the fire, you wonder if that feeble old man could ever have been the restless, fidgety, madcap schoolboy, the ardent lover sighing like a furnace, the fierce soldier, bearded like a pard, full of strange oaths, seeking the bubble reputation at the cannon's mouth? Where be his pranks now, where his sighs, his big, loud voice? All these things have passed away like a dream, and in old age, he awakes again infancy?

I think it must be pleasant to sit on the shore thus and wait for the boat, not impatient for, neither dreading its coming, pleasant to hear the plash of the oars and the distant song of the rowers, as they come to bear you away to that golden land where youth is eternal. I should find it difficult to talk of old grandfathers otherwise than in this strain, for I have never known an old grandfather, who, whatever his previous life, did not wear an aspect of innocence. Age is not altogether unkind. While it withers the beauty, it also expunges the traces of evil passions. The film that comes over the eye, is a veil to hide the glare of anger; the wrinkles that score the brow are the strokes of time's pen, designed to obliterate he frown and the scowl that passion had written there so boldly. I can recall many grandfathers that were a practical testimony to the soundness of the theory which I have just broached with regard to the purifying influence of age. I remember one, a little, feeble, merry-hearted old fellow, who had been a terrible Turk in his young days. He had been passionate, imperious, violent, a constant source of trouble to his wife, and a terror to his children. When he became an old grandfather, he was transformed into the most docile creature imaginable. His own little grandchildren could rule him and make him do just as they liked.

"Do you remember, grandfather," one of them would say, "when you used to give it to your boys all round with the horsewhip?"

"No, no, my dear," he would answer, "I hope I never did that."

"Oh, but you did, grandfather, and grandmother says you used to get drunk and break the chimney ornaments."

"Oh, fie, no my dear," says the old man; "it couldn't have been me, it must have been somebody else."

And granny strikes in and affirms that he did the deed, completely smashing two china shepherdesses that had been in the family for a century. Which relation sets the old man into a fit of laughter so hearty and good humored, that you cannot conceive how he could ever have been guilty of the violent conduct imputed to him. I dare say he can scarcely believe it himself now, when age has cast the devil out of him.

I remember another grandfather whose ninety-second birthday was celebrated not many years ago, at the house of his granddaughter. He was a picture of aged innocence, gentle, patient, affectionate and docile as a child. But he had been—as he himself confessed with a sigh, "a roarer" in his day—a sad dog among the women, sir; a six-bottle man, a beator of the watch, a brawler, a swaggerer, ever ready to eat fire and resent the slightest insult with lead and steel.

And there he was, on his ninety second birthday, propped up to the table with a napkin tied round his neck. The swaggerer who was so ready with sword and pistol, cannot now be trusted with knife and fork. His food had been cut up for him, and he is eating it with a spoon. The six-bottle man is drinking toast and water, weakly flavored with brandy from a mug. He cannot grasp a tumbler now, and finds it convenient to have a drinking vessel with a handle. He who had been a sad dog among the women, sir, and ruined so many reputations, grows faint before the feast is over, and feebly calls to his granddaughter to come and support him. And there he lies like a weak child, nestling his palsied head on her bosom—the gay Lothario!

I sometimes wonder what is meant by the commandment which says, "Honor thy father and thy mother; that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Does it mean that they who honor their father and mother will live long? Can it be that those otherwise wicked persons who live to be happy old grandfathers, attain length of days, because in their youth they honored their fathers and mothers? It is pleasant to think so; pleasant to see how bread thus early cast upon the waters, comes back after many days to the generous hand which originally bestowed it. How seldom do we meet on the highway of life with a gray-headed grandfather trudging the last miles of the journey, friendless and alone. Nearly always he has children or grandchildren by his side to ease his burden and take him by the hand and help him up when he faints by the way.

With regard to grandmothers! Is it not a fact that we are accustomed to associate a certain idea of worldliness and selfishness—of wickedness in fact—with grandmothers which does not arise in out mind when we picture to ourself an aged grandfather? We are indebted in a great measure to the novel writers for this impression; but we have no reason to question the faithfulness of the picture. We rarely have the idea of a wicked old grandfather, but we often, I am afraid, have the idea of a wicked old grandmother. There is a popular ideal of the wicked old woman in a wig, walking with a crutch stick, match-making for worldly goods, scheming, lying, telling improper stories, gambling at cards and cheating sometimes. Is it a true picture, a faithful likeness? I am afraid sometimes it is. There are good grandmothers, of course; but there are bad ones, and they are more often bad than the grandfathers. But we must make reasonable allowance for them. A man in his young and middle days can have his fling and take his fill of pleasure. He can sow his wild oats to the last grain. The wide scope of his indulgence enabled him to see the folly of things. Not so with a woman. Her young days are a period of restraint; her married life is one of subjection. If she be wickedly inclined, it is not until she becomes an old grandmother that she can have her fling. The old grandfather has done with the froward ways of the world; the old grandmother begins to take them in hand.

There are certain outward attributes of the grandmother which accord with this view of her character. While the old grandfather humbly bows his bald head or blanched hair to the stroke of Time, the old grandmother endeavors to bear up against him with a wig or false front. She is a skittish creature sometimes, and will go out into the field when the harvest is fully ripe, and coquette with the old gentleman who wields the scythe. She beguiles him to drop his gleaming blade and sid down beside her; and she is quite free with him, and taps him over his old knuckles with her fan. This grandmother tricks herself into the belief that the old man will continue polite, and will not suddenly rise up, take his weapon in hand, and cut her down with the rest. And so she goes on pursuing worldly traffic to the very last. This, of course, is only true of some old women; but it is true of them all, that they are more troubled about the world's affairs than men; that when they are disposed to any vice, they follow it with a stronger passion; that when they are the victims of any weakness, they are more completely under its influence. Avarice has been called a good old gentlemanly vice. It is rather, I think, a good old gentlewomanly vice. There is an extreme period of age when a man drops the money-bags; but a woman clings to them to the last, and will die with her fingers clutching them. Not that she is naturally more avaricious than man, but her life of dependence has filled her with an inordinate dread of poverty. She is afraid of being alone and friendless, without money.

The old man has not this dread. At a certain stage he cares little what becomes of him. He will go to the workhouse cheerfully, while the woman will, of all last resources, avoid that.

The drop of dew which glistens under the sunlight like a diamond, reveals under the microscope a mass of writhing, wriggling worms, fearsome to look at. Let us then stand a little back from our grandfathers and grandmothers. Let us shut up the microscope and view them under the sun. Going down the hill together hand in hand, they are a spectacle to fill the heart with gratitude to Heaven that such a peaceful fate is man's on earth. What a privilege for a grown man to have an aged grandfather and grandmother!—to be their stay and support in their old days; to stand by at last and close their eyes. What happiness to the aged to be thus lovingly tended, and have their own old care repaid to them. Truly, length of days are a blessed portion to old people, who live to see their children and their children's children spring up around them with a constant increase of affection—giving assurance that man can never die, and love can never fade.

AN ECCENTRIC INVENTOR.—In noticing the death of Mr. Appold, the well-known engineer, a London paper observes that the most remarkable proofs of his cleverness as an inventor were collected in his own house and the works adjoining it. There everything that could be made so was automatic. The doors opened as you approached them, and closed after you had entered; water came unbidden into the basins; when the gas was lighted the shutters closed; a self-acting thermometer prevented the temperature rising or falling above or below certain fixed points; and the air supplied for ventilation was both washed to cool and screened to cleanse it from blacks. Even the gates of his stable-yard opened of themselves as he drove through, and closed again without slamming.

The Wrong Side of the Curve.

AN EX-ENGINEER'S STORY.

Among the many incidents that during the late rebellion were connected with that great national artery, the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, is one that I will relate.

In the fall of 1861, having been detained by business in the town of Cumberland, Md., I was at last about to start for Wheeling, when I learned by a despatch that the road was occupied below Harper's Ferry by a force of rebels, and therefore no train would pass.

This proved to be true in reference to ordinary trains, but a "special" with which was the Hon. Mr. Pierpont, and a few other notabilities, had passed before the rebels cut the track, and was therefore approaching. On inquiry, I found that the engineer of the coming train had been one of my old chums ere I had discarded engine-driving for a more profitable business. My friend Joe M—— was a cool, bold, skilful engineer, and as generous as reckless of danger.

As I expected, I no sooner saw him and stated my wish to go up the road, than he swore that, special or no special, I should ride with him, if for nothing but to see the "fast time" his engine "Wildfire" would make.

As we dashed rapidly along and were passing through Black Oak Bottom, a couple of ill-looking fellows in citizen's dress fired at the engineer, but doing no damage, merely provoked a laugh of derision from him for their want of marksmanship. On arriving at Oakland, Md., we were disagreeably surprised by receiving a telegram informing us that a party of rebels were making extraordinary haste to reach the railway at a point many miles ahead of us. Also, they seemed to know who the special train contained, and would therefore use all endeavors to capture or kill us.

There was but one car behind the engine, and in it was briefly discussed the question of go or stay, while Joe was having the tender re-filled with wood and water.

Mr. Pierpont's business was too urgent to admit of any possible delay; two or three others concluded to risk the trip, and I—well, if it's not too egotistical to say so—I had run risks on railways too often to back out because there was danger ahead, while the rest concluded to stay and trust to luck for the opportunity of getting away.

Just as we were about to start, the fireman making a misstep on the "running board," fell and struck the ground with such force as to break his arm. Joe hurriedly picked up the poor fellow, but time was precious just then, so leaving him in care of the gentlemen who had accompanied us, he started directly toward me, asking me to come and "run" for him, as, having no fireman, he would have more than he could do. I told him, however, to consider me his fireman for the rest of the trip as he was best acquainted with the road, so without any more ado I doffed my coat, we jumped on and away we went, past hamlets, through wildernesses of stunted bushes, up grade and down hill, at a speed rarely equaled. Our light train made firing an easy task for me, and I had frequent leisure to scan the beautiful ranges of the Alleghanies along which we skirted. Joe was sitting as was usual with him, with his left hand on the throttle-lever, and his body half out of the side window of the "cab," that he might the better scan the track ahead.

A few miles south of the famous Cheat River Bridge is a deep mountain gorge, with precipitous rocky sides.

It is shaped like an hour-glass, wide at each end, but tapering each way toward the middle. The track runs for quite a distance along one side of the gorge, makes a very abrupt turn to cross the chasm, a very deep one, in a straight line, and then, still curving inwardly, follows the gorge in a line nearly parallel with the track on the opposite side, for three-fourths of a mile.

We were pitching along with that peculiar rocking, bounding motion, so different from the jar of ordinary fast speed. As we swept to the top of a grade around the side of a hill that commanded a view of the gorge—Joe and I both on the lookout—we saw, at a moment's glance, enough to make us concentrate our thinking faculties, and act in a hurry whatever was best to be done.

There, on the straight track, just at the near end of the gorge, a lot of men, in gray uniform, were hastily piling up some old ties, logs, etc.; while at the point where the curve was sharpest—before reaching the gorge—[illegible] more, tugging furiously at a rail, one end of which seemed to baffle them, as they pulled it outwards. We were within a mile of them when we discovered them, and as each noticed them, the shout came simultaneously from both of us—"The wrong side of the curve!" The ignorant fools were pulling out the inside rail instead of the outside. In the latter case nothing could have saved us from running off the track, and probably into the gorge. Our single brakesman, seeing the danger—I suppose from habit—was commencing to tighten the brake, but at a look from Joe I signaled "off brakes," Joe meanwhile opening the throttle to its widest extent as we dashed down the grade at a positively frightful velocity.

As we neared them, a party of them huddled together near the track. I seized a large stick of wood, intending, if possible, to hurt "somebody." We were going altogether too swift to fear their taking aim at us; and for that matter, I suppose they considered our destruction such a certainty that firing at us would be needless. I was poising the big stick of wood, and guessing at the rate of speed—I've had some practice in throwing parcels from trains in motion—when Joe suddenly pulled the whistle rope. The hoarse shriek seemed to startle them for an instant; they huddled closer together, and I tossed the stick outwards and downwards. I had barely time to see it crash through the group with the force of a thunderbolt, when, with a jarring plunge, the wheels on one side struck the naked ties. That part of the trouble we had feared but little, as the impetus of the engine was almost sure to make it mount the track again. On the track again, but a few rods ahead of us was the formidable barricade, and beyond that the yawning chasm. Joe was standing up now, with eyes blazing, still holding the throttle wide open, as he braced himself for the shock. I had grasped the brake-rod of the tender the instant I threw the piece of wood. Crash!—my hold didn't avail me, and I was pitched head over heels against the fire-box, and laid flat on my back on the foot-board or floor of the engine.

Joe was as suddenly jerked half around, his back striking a little door in front of where he had stood, breaking the door and shivering the glass to atoms. But we were through; how, we couldn't tell, except that we were still on the track, and thundering over the gorge. Joe's spirits rose with the occasion. Extricating himself almost as suddenly as he had been deposited in the little glass door, he jerked a tin flask from his pocket, sprung on top of the tender, and from thence to the roof the cab. Steadying himself for moment, with his face toward the rebels, he shouted "good-bye," and then made them a low bow, and took a drink, perfectly regardless of the white puffs of smoke, as one after another discharged their pieces at him, as he afterwards explained, "the engine made too much noise for him to hear the bullets, and they didn't seem to be hitting anybody."

After having, in spite of sore bones, performed a jig which he had extemporized for that occasion for the express edification of the rebs, Joe descended from his perch, and deliberately shutting off steam, stopped.

We were still in sight of them, though at a tolerably safe distance, and now saw a group of them standing near several men who had been wounded, perhaps some killed, by that "irrepressible" stick of wood.

Our damages were a few bruises each, but no serious hurts. Our engine suffered the loss of the pilot or cow-catcher and headlight, the front of the smoke-box was stove in, besides sundry dents and bruises on the brass casings of the cylinders; but for running purposes absolutely uninjured, the rebels having piled logs squarely across the top of the track, the point of the cow-killer had gone under them, and, though broken by the shock, had raised them sufficiently to keep them from under the wheels, while the engine dashed them right and left into the gorge.

The rebels seeing us stop, started in pursuit, but as we found nothing serious to impede our further progress, and, as in their case, "distance lent enchantment to the view," we were off again in high spirits, and without further adventure worth recounting, arrived safely at our destination.

Poor Joe, after being shot at so often as to have acquired a sovereign contempt for rebel bullets, was shot dead, about a year ago, while running a government engine near Chattanooga.

THE INFANT'S DREAM.

Oh! cradle me on thy knee, Mamma,
And sing me that holy strain
That soothed me last night as you fondly press'd
My glowing cheek to your soft white breast;
For I saw a sight as you sang me to rest,
That I fain would see again.

And smile as you then did smile, Mamma,
And weep as you then did weep;
Then fix on me your gladsome eye,
And gaze and gaze till the tear be dry,
Then rock me gently and sing and sigh,
Till you lull me fast asleep.

For I dreamed a heavenly dream, Mamma,
While slumbering on thy knee;
And I lived in a land where forms divine
In kindoms of glory eternally shine,
And the world I'd give if the world were mine,
Again that land to see.

Then sing, for I fain would sleep, Mamma,
And dream as I dreamed before;
For sound was my slumber, and sweet was my rest
While my spirit in the kingdom of life was a guest,
And the heart that has throb'd in the climes of the blest,
Can love this world no more.

Squire Pitman's Peaches.

Squire Pitman was sitting in his library, looking over the evening paper, when a noise was heard at the door, and Reuben and the gardener appeared, each with a boy.

"Here they are, sir," said James.

"We've caught 'em," said Reuben.

"Bless my soul," said the squire, "and what are their names?"

"This one is Tom Grey, and the other one is Frank Green."

"Very well, you may leave the young gentlemen here with me."

"Yes, sir."

Rather reluctantly Reuben and James let go their hold of our young adventurers, and left them.

Frank looked sideways at the [illegible] expecting to be seized and shaken, or [illegible] receive a severe scolding. What was their surprise when the old gentleman came forward very pleasantly, and said—

"Boys, I am very happy to see you. I like to receive visits from young people, though I think it better in such cases for them to come through the gate and not get over the fence, as they are liable to tear their clothes."

Frank looked down at his torn trowsers in a little bewilderment.

"Pray, sit down," said the squire, very politely.

Tom and Frank sat down on the corners of two chairs, evidently ill at ease.

"How old are you, Thomas? I believe that is your name."

"Twelve, sir."

"And you, Frank?"

"I am twelve, too."

"And I am seventy. It was really kind in you to come and call upon an old gentleman like me. But the evenings are short; you ought to have come earlier."

Tom looked at Frank in silent wonder. He didn't know what it all meant. If he had been shaken up, that he would have understood, but the squire's manner puzzled him completely.

"Are you fond of fruit, Thomas?" asked the squire innocently.

"Ye-es," said Tom, a little uneasily.

"Do you like it, too, Frank?"

"Pretty well," said Frank, who was a little afraid of committing himself.

"So I suppose. Most boys do."

Squire Pitman rose from his seat and rang the bell.

"You may bring in some plates and knives and lay them on the table," said he to the servant.

This was done. Next the old gentleman went to the closet and brought out a basket of peaches.

"I generally keep a little fruit," he remarked, "to treat friends who are kind enough to call on me. Help yourselves."

The wondering boys did so, and commenced eating. They wondered whether the shaking would come up after the peaches were eaten. Even if it did, they would have the satisfaction of eating them.

"Do you like them?" asked the squire, who seemed to enjoy seeing the boys eat.

"Yes, sir," said Tom, "they're tip-top."

"I'm glad you think so. I have several peach trees in my garden. James, the gardener, was telling me that there was some danger of boys getting in and robbing the trees, but I don't have any fears on that score."

Here Tom and Frank exchanged glances.

"If any of the boys want fruit, I know they would prefer to come and ask me for it, or drop in and make a friendly call, as you are doing. By the way, wouldn't you like to carry home some peaches?"

"Yes, sir," said the boys, hesitatingly.

"If you had something to put them in—"

"I've got a handkerchief," said Tom.

"And I've got a bag," said Frank.

"Bless my soul, how thoughtful you were to bring a bag! It will be just the thing. You're welcome to the peaches in that basket if you can stow them away."

"We are very much obliged to you," said Tom gratefully.

"Oh, don't say a word. It is a mere trifle, and I like to make some acknowledgment for your kind call. Will you call and see me again?"

"Yes, sir, if you should like it."

"I should be most happy to have you come. I get lonely sometimes, and young company cheers me up. Perhaps, though, you had better come to the door, as it is a little dangerous climbing over fences," added the old gentleman a little slyly.

The boys laughed a little consciously, and were shown to the door, Squire Pitman shaking them both by the hand, and kindly repeating his invitation.

"Ain't he a trump?" ejaculated Frank, when the door closed behind them.

"That's so. I felt awful mean to have him treat me so, when I had come after his peaches."

"So did I. You won't catch me in such business again."

The story of the boys' visit to Squire Pitman leaked out, and made quite a sensation among the school-boys. It was unanimously agreed that it would be the height of meanness to make any further attemps upon the property of one who had treated their companions so handsomely. The gardener kept watch for a few nights, but from that time Squire Pitman's trees were as safe as if a bull-dog had been chained at the foot of every tree.—Student and Schoolmate.

THE Raleigh Progress gives the following dialogue.

Army Chaplain.—"My young colored friend, can you read?"

Contraband.—"Yes sah."

Army Chaplain.—"Glad to hear it; shall I give you a paper?"

Contraband.—"Sartin, massa, if you please."

Army Chaplain.—Very good. What paper would you choose?"

"Contraband.—"Well massa, if you chews I'll take a paper of tobacker."

The chaplain looked at the contraband and the contraband looked at the chaplain; then the latter sighed and passed on.

Poetry in Undress.

An English paper which rejoices in the name of "Ladies' Own," thus plays tricks with rhyme and reason: "It is many years since I fell in love with Jane Jerusha Skeggs, the handsomest country girl by far that ever went on legs. By meadow, creek, and wood, and dell, so often did we walk, and the moonlight smiled on her melting lips, and the night winds learned our talk. Jane Jerusha was all to me, for my heart was young and true, and loved with a double and twisted love, and a love that was honest too. I roamed all over the neighbors' farms and I robbed the wildwood bowers, and tore my trousers and scratched my hands, in search for the choicest flowers. In my boyish love, I brought all these to my Jerusha Jane; but I wouldn't be so foolish now, if I were a boy again. A city chap that came along, all dressed up in fine clothes, with a shiny hat and a shiny vest, and a mustache under his nose. He talked to her of singing schools, (for her father owned a farm), and she left me, the country love, and took the new chap's arm. And all that night I never slept, nor could I eat next day, for I loved that girl with a fervent love that nought could drive away. I strove to win her back to me, but it was all in vain; the city chap with the hairy lip, married Jerusha Jane. And my poor heart was sick and sore, until the thought struck me, that just as good fish still remained, as ever were caught in the sea. So I went to the Methodist Church one night, and saw a dark brown curl peeping from under a gypsy hat and I married that very girl. And many years have passed and gone, and I think my loss my gain; and I often bless that hairy chap, that stole Jerusha Jane."

WORDS FOR POOR BOYS.—When I was a boy of twelve years, I was working for twenty-five cents a week for an old lady, and I tell you I had my hands full; but I did my word faithfully. I used to bring water and cut wood, and scrub and scour mornings for the old lady, before the real work of the day commenced. My clothes were bad, and I had no means of buying shoes, so I was often barefooted. One morning I got through my work early, and the old lady who thought I had not done it, or was specially ill-humored then, was displeased and scolded me, and said I was idle and had not worked. I said I had. She called me a "liar." I felt my spirits rise against this, and standing erect I indignantly told her that she would never have the chance of applying that word to me again. I walked out of the house to re-enter it no more. I had not a cent in my pocket when I stepped out into the world. What do you suppose I did then, boys? I met a countryman with a team. I addressed him boldly and earnestly, and offered to drive the leader if he would only take me on. He looked at me in surprise, but said he did not think I would be of any use. "Oh yes I will," said I. "I can rub down and watch your horses, and do many things for you if you will only let me try." He no longer objected. I got on the horse's back. It was hard traveling, for the roads were bad, and we could only get on at the rate of twelve miles a day. This however was my starting point. I went ahead after this. An independent spirit, and steady, honest conduct, with what capacity God had given me—as he has given you—has carried me successfully through the world. Don't be down hearted at being poor and having no friends. Try and try again. You can cut your way through if you live, so please God. I know it is a hard time with some of you. You often are hungry and wet with rain and snow, and it seems dreary to have no one in the city to care for you. But trust in Christ, and he will be your friend. Keep of good heart, and be determined to make your way honestly and truly in the world. As I said, I feel for you because I have gone through it all—I know what it is. God bless you.—Preacher.

THE incident related above, must have been invented by "Preacher," or perhaps some one has given the wrong credit. But the anecdote is a veritable one that happened to the lamented Gen. Ormsby M. Mitchell in his early days and in his native state, Kentucky.

Mexico and Bonaparte.

The second volume of the miscellaneous writings of Louis Napoleon, contains the following reply of Joseph, the elder brother of the first Napoleon, to a deputation of Mexican Spaniards, who waited upon him about forty years ago, during his majesty's residence at Bordentown, New Jersey, for the purpose of offering to him the throne of Mexico:

"I have worn two crowns, and do not feel disposed to wear a third. Nothing could be more flattering than this offer, proceeding as it does from those who denied my authority at Madrid, whilst I was king of Spain, and who, now when I am in exile, desire me to become emperor of Mexico. But I do not think that the throne which you propose to build up, will be conducive to your prosperity. Every day which I pass on the hospitable soil of the United States assures me more and more of the excellent fitness of Republican institutions so far as the American continent is concerned. Preserve, therefore the most precious blessing of providence. Put an end to your internal discord. Emulate the example of the United States, and select from the ranks of your fellow citizens some one who is more competent than I am to perform the great part of Washington."

FAMILY COURTESIES.—In the family, the law of pleasing ought to extend from the highest to the lowest. You are bound to please your children; and your children are bound to please each other; and you are bound to please your servants, if you expect them to please you. Some men are pleasant in the household and nowhere else. I have known such men. They are good fathers and kind husbands. If you had seen them in their own house you would have thought they were angels, almost; but if you had seen them in the street, or in the store, or anywhere else out of the house, you would have thought them almost demoniac. But the opposite is apt to be the case. When we are among our neighbors, or among strangers, we hold ourselves with self-respect, and endeavor to act with propriety; but when we get home we say to ourselves: "I have played a part long enough, and I am now going to be natural." So we sit down, and we are ugly and snappish and blunt and disagreeable. We lay aside those thousand little courtesies that make the roughest floor smooth, that make the hardest thing like velvet, and that make life pleasant. We expend all our politeness where it will be profitable—where it will bring silver and gold.

Josh Billings Discourses Concerning Men of Big Genius.

A big genius is generally a phool; he knows how to do one or two things so much that he ain't fit for anything else; he is like a greyhound, good for running fast, that's all. You kant lern enny more than you can an eagle; he knows how to fli up and look at the sun without winken, because he was born so, and when he gets up on the peke of the mountain and gets well lit, you kant go tew him, nor he won't come tew you, but thare he sets till the dinner bell rings. After dinner he flize oph agane, and you won't see him till supper time. Tha are like mummeys, very curis kritters, and kepe a long time without spileing. If tha only had common sense, so that you could make talers or shumakers ov them, thare would be some sense ov having the breed more plenty; but one or two iz aul that iz profitable to have on hand tew onst, and tha are enough to keep enny boddy uneasy about what tha are going tew dew next. They live about 40 yeres ahed of the times, and when the world ketches up with the last one, another iz born, who spends most of his time in digging up the old bones that the last one buried. About the only thing they sho enny common sense in iz, that they most always die in debt to everybody. The most unfortunate thing about having a big genius on hand, iz that so many try to imitate them, but they don't generally get any farther up than their vices, and thus one big genius suckles a thousand phools. Tha don't generally live happy, because tha ain't built right to fit things as tha find them. Tha ought to have a grate place tew stop in, where there ain't nothing but big generalitys to dew, and whare tha kan play tost and ketch with the stars, and krack butternuts and mountains. Tha are curious critters.

Tha ain't afraid to straddle a hurry kane without enny bridle on, and stick in the spurs, but a mice nibblin' in the wanescut will drive him bareheaded into the street. They can plant, but they won't kultivate nor reap.

If I waz a woman, I would as soon marry a porcupine as a big genius; they are neither az hot az the stove in the districkt skule house, or az kold and unfeeling az the shoes on a dead omnibus hoss. A genius iz like a big comet, that appears onse about so often, and makes everybody nervis, and then disappears, and though we may not at the time be able to put our fingers on the identical good tha have dunn us, still their visit is a big one, and the grate reservoys are pumped up fuller, and we poor men, the rest ov us, when we stick in our little fountains, find that thewaters have been freshened and sweetened by sumbody.

Storing Roots for Winter.

I have been storing roots for a number of years, and have tried various ways of keeping them in winter, and have found that by burying them in the field, they will come out better in the spring than any way I have tried. If there is no danger of water getting in the heap, I make a long one in the middle of my batch of roots; after pulling a few rows, I take the horses and plow, and make a trench by turning a furrow each way. The roots can be wheeled in from each way, or hauled in a cart. After topping the heap to the requisite height I put a little straw on and then about six inches of earth—this is spanked down; about every eight feet I stand a wisp of straw upright for chimneys, to let dampness escape, as they will sweat. Before freezing weather. I haul some long manure and put on the heap.

A long heap has this advantage—you can work at each end, and over the middle; and when you take them out upon one end only, and after taking out what you want, throw some of the manure on to prevent their freezing. Should there be danger of water, I put a heap on top of the ground; this takes a little more time to cover them. I have had as much as five hundred bushels of turnips in a heap of this kind. Carrots and ruta-bagas I bury in the same way.—Cor. Germantown Telegraph.

GETTING MARRIED.—A rather laughable transaction took place a week or two ago in the town of Dewitt, Clinton county, Michigan in which love and business are so intermixed that it requires an adept to distinguish between the two. A milk-safe peddler called at a house to sell a "safe." The woman informed him that she was a widow, and would much rather have a man (safer.) The peddler informed her that, if she would take a safe he would send her a man. She took it, and the peddler went on his way rejoicing. He soon met a man who he ascertained had no bosom companion, and directed him to the widow. Going on, he called at a house to sell a safe, and was informed that the man was a widower, and would prefer a wife. He told him if he would take a safe he would direct him to where he could get a woman. He took the safe and the peddler directed him to the same widow. When he reached her, he was about an hour too late, the first having just secured the prize. The kind-hearted woman, however, sent him to a second woman, whom he secured; and both loving couples were married that afternoon.—Exchange.

MANURE MUST BE CHANGED.—It is known that green manure, or manure fresh from the stables will not do to apply to crops. This manure must in all cases be changed before it is thus applied. It must be decomposed (rotted). It is then plant-food, and may be applied directly, either as top-dressing, or otherwise. In the liquid form it is the same thing. The juices themselves must be decomposed. Hence we see the injury which grass receives on the application of fresh night-soil, or any fresh manure in the liquid form.

But the green manure may be plowed in to great advantage where a fallow is made. Plow in with the first or second plowing, leaving time for the action of the heat and air upon the manure. It is excellent to mix thoroughly with the soil if not plowed to deep, or with the top soil. We have never known it to fail in such case. On very poor soil it always has a wonderful effect.—Coleman's Rural World.

IMPORTANT.—Bells will prevent the depredations of dogs among your sheep.

A dog that knows enough to kill sheep, also known enough to be still and sly about it. The great noise caused by a number of bells, makes him fear for his safety, and he leaves without doing any damage. The bells would also bring the friends of the sheep to their rescue. A dozen bells in a flock of fifty or seventy five sheep would be ample. In a flock of twelve sheep, half of them should wear bells. Bells will protect your woolly hords.—Amer. Ag.

GEORGE BUTLER presented us with three apples the other day, taken from a tree in his brother's orchard, which were a novelty indeed—their blow end being excellently sweet, and their stem being a decided acid. Between the ends was every variety of flavor. The tree produces the same style of fruit every year. The fruit beats anything in our previous apple experience.—Waukegan (Ill.) Gazette.

WE are told from France that all the remarkable features of the season of 1811, have been repeated in 1865 in the French vineyards. The grapes have been so plentiful, and the juice so abundant, that large quantities of wine have been wasted in consequence of the want of casks in which to store it.

THE Sandusky (O.) Register states that twenty tons of grapes were brought from Kelley's Island and shipped to the east in a single day, and still the picking on the islands had hardly commenced

The Stomach is the great co[illegible] hces the health or the disease of the [illegible] ed or debilitated by excess indigesti[illegible] eath and physical prostration are the natural [illegible] nsequences. Allied to the brain it is the source of headaches, mental depression, nervous complaints and unrefreshing sleep. The liver becomes affected and generates bilious disorders, pains in the side &c. The Bowels sympathize by Costiveness. Diarrhoea and Dysentry. The principal action of these Pills is on the stomach, and the liver, lungs, bowels and kidneys participate in their recuperative and regenerative operation.

Erysipelas and Salt Rheum.

Are two of the most common and virulent disorders prevalent on this continent, to these the Ointment is especially antagonistic its "modus operandi" is first to eradicate the venom and then complete the cure.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Ulcers,

Eruptions on the Skin,

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic diseases are eradicated and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Female Complaints.

Whether in the young or old, married or single, at the dawn of Womanhood, or the turn of life, these tonic medicines display so decided an influence that a marked improvement is soon preceptible in the health of the patient. Being a purely vegetable preparation they are safe and reliable remedy for all classes of females in every condition of health and station of life.

Piles and Fistula

Every form and feature of those prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emolient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healing qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills should be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Mercurial Eruptions,	Swelled Glands
Sprains,	Burns,	Piles,

A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

Advantages of this Plow.

It will last from three to six times longer than any other Steel Plow made anywhere by anybody. This has often been proved by actual use in "gritty" soils, occasionally to be found on the margins of streams in the West, in which sheet-steel Plows have been habitually "cut through" in plowing eighty acres or less, it having already plowed over three hundred acres of the same soil without yet being half worn.

It will "scour" in the most difficult soils, where all other Plows have failed. If there is a rod of ground anywhere in which it will not scour, we have yet to find it.

It draws lighter than any other Plow while cutting the same width and depth.

The Share can be sharpened, or a Point welded on, as readily as on ordinary Plows, by any blacksmith who understands his trade, as the steel is perfectly malleable, and works "kindly".

Any section can be replaced by a duplicate, to be had of any Agent, as the Share, Landside and Mouldboard are cast in moulds.

It is well stocked with New England second growth timber, and the standard is wrought iron with "slots" in the clip so as to grease take time at pleasure.

It plows at any depth, from three to twelve inches, works perfectly in other substitute in fact leaves a clean furrow, and turns under stubble and foul trash completely.

It is the cleanest Plow in the world, just at soon as there is economy in paying six dollars once rather than five dollars five orsix times over; — in not losing time and your temper because your Plow won't "scour;" — and in doing a quarter or a fifth more work, with the same power. The quality and quantity of work it will enable to perform must be considered, as well as the cost price in determining whether or not the Plow is cheap. Plows are used for profit, and the one cost which are most useful and cents can be made in proportion to cents cost is the cheapest, and we are confident a man gets more than a hundred dollars' worth of "Plow" every time he gets one of these.

These remarks are made after a familiarity with the merits of most of the good Plows in use in the West, many of which have justly earned a good reputation.

Our new model "B" Plow is designed expressly for stubble and foul ground heretofore we have had only the "C" pattern designed for both, turf and stubble. The "B" and "C" patterns together will enable us, to meet the views of all as to shape, and give them either "bold" or "lean" plows as they prefer.

Call and see them.

Warranty very liberal.

Tindall & Slayton, Tecumseh.

These Bitters are prepared, in pure Bourbon Whiskey, from a combination of over twenty different kinds of roots, barks and herbs, which act in perfect concert one with other, prepared from the original formula given by the great chief, Red Jacket, to Dr. Chapin, who used them successfully in his practice for many years, and by their use gained so great a popularity in the treatment and cure of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Constipation, Sick and Nervous Headache, Fever and Ague, and all diseases arising from torpid liver or indigestion. Persons suffering from either of these loathsome diseases will find a sure cure by the use of these Bitters, which are perfectly pure and free from all those drugs and poisons usually put up in such preparations and poison all on an unsuspecting public. A single trial will convince the most skeptical that in the RED JACKET there is virtue which no other Bitters possess.

They strengthen and invigorate the system.
They are unequaled for general debility.
They are a sure cure for dyspepsia.
They give a good and healthy appetite.
They assist digestion.
They are the best stimulant in existence.
They are a preventive of Fever and Ague.
They relieve constipation.
They cure Nervous Headache.
They are perfectly pure and palatable.

Aged persons and delicate females will find they can save large doctor's bills by the use of these Bitters.

Beware of counterfeits. The Red Jacket Bitters are only sold in bottles with our name blown on the side, and our private government stamp across the cork.

For Medicinal and Table uses, which are perfectly pure, and need only be tried to be appreciated. None genuine unless they have our gold label on each bottle, and our initials pressed in wax over the cork.

Sold by all druggists and dealers throughout the [illegible] and take no other.

Ladies—are you in need of a pair of those beautiful and useful Congress Gaiters, or Balmorals?—you can find them at the Mammoth, and for prices that will astonish all who are in the habit of buying elsewhere, at high figures,

We would say to all those in need of anything in the line of Boots, Shoes, Leather and findings generally:—call and examine the large stock at the Mammoth before purchasing elsewhere. You will find ED. and WILL. ever ready to wait on you with pleasure.

Those in want of Furs are respectfully requested to examine Moore's goods before purchasing elsewhere.

Memory:

Twilight lingers;
And memory with busy fingers
Weaves a bright chaplet round my brain,
Made up of joys, all which were mine
"Long, long ago"
But now, are wasted,
Scattered on the stream of time.

Dews are weeping,
And the sweet flowers are sleeping
While I am dreaming of the happy days
When nought but sunshine cast its golden rays
Across my path;
The sunshine now is faded,
And my bright pathway shaded.

Daylight is breaking,
And my dreamy soul is waking,
Still, I look back upon the tide,
And strong imagination pictures by my side
The loved ones;
Who have long ago gone home,
And left me here, to sigh, "alone."

Benefit Concert:

A Concert for the benefit of the Soldiers Monument Association will be given in Bidwell's Hall on Thursday and Friday evenings Nov. 16th and 17th, by Prof. Leland's adult singing class. Prof. Leland has very kindly offered to give a couple of his superior entertainments in aid of the Soldiers Monument and the citizens of Tecumseh owe it to themselves to give him a rousing audience on both evenings. He has a large stock of music both grave and humorous to make his selection from, and has bestowed great care in the arrangement of the programmes. His reputation as a singing teacher stands very high. Indeed as a careful and thorough drill master in Chorus and Quartette singing, he has but few equals and no superior in the West. Let all who love good singing attend. Let all who desire to aid in the erection of the Monument attend. Let all who like to have a good time generally attend, and let all who desire good seats procure tickets early at Ketcham's news rooms.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK.

The small pox is spreading rapidly at Montgomery, Alabama, both among the whites and blacks.

South American advices state that there had been no severe engagement between the Paraguayans and the allies lately. About 8,000 Paraguayans had shut themselves up in the town of Urquyana, and were besieged by an army of 20,000 allies.

The cholera in Spain is disappearing, and only a few cases are reported in Germany. Bishop Lynch, a passenger by the Europe, which arrived at New York from Havre on the 30 ult., states that the cholera in Paris is not an epidemic.

No further deaths are reported on the quarantine steamer Atlanta. The filthy condition of the boat was one of the principal causes of the disease, which is confined to the steerage passengers. Several new cases have broken out. Not a case has occurred among the first or second cabin passengers, or among the crew of the ship.

An infernal machine was thrown into the window of a dwelling house in Chicago on the 30th, nearly blowing up the house, but fortunately injuring no one.

The Chicago Republican of the 6th gives a report from Washington that Jeff. Davis is not to be tried at all, but exiled to Europe, instead of being sentenced to our cop.

Jeff Davis evidently does not expect to be executed this winter, as he has ordered a new overcoat for his own wear. A Washington despatch to the New York Tribune intimates that Davis will escape without punishment.

At Chattanooga on the 23d ult., there were 150 cases of small pox, and the disease was spreading.

Mt. Hood, a volcano, is now in a state of eruption. The bursting forth of its lava is thought to have occasioned the earthquake felt in California.

The victims of the St. John's disaster now foot up thirteen. The most disgraceful scenes of robbery transpired during the fearful disaster. The cause of the explosion was an imperfection in the boiler.

A monument of Italian marble, twenty-eight feet high, designed and constructed by L. W. Volk of Chicago, and costing $5,000, has been erected in the public square at Girard, Erie county, Pennsylvania, in memory of the officers and soldiers from that county who have died in the defense of their country. The monument is the gift of Dan Rice the showman, whose residence is at Girard. It was publicly dedicated on the 1st inst., with addresses by Governor Curtin, ex-Governor Tod, and others, and excursion trains from Cleveland, Buffalo and Pittsburg brought in thousands of people to enjoy the occasion. For the benefit of these thousands, Dan gave an exhibition of his trained animals, and closed the season's business.

The steamer City of Boston brings the news of the death of Lord Palmerston, Premier of England, aged eighty-one. He was born in Hampshire county, Oct. 20th, 1784, entered public life in 1807, in which with few and short intermissions, he has continued until the date of his death. Without abilities of the highest order, lacking consistency in his views and measures, distrusted in his domestic policy by all parties, he has yet by his attractive personal qualities and dexterity in shifting position as the public opinion veered this way or that, together with his vigorous foreign policy, managed to keep himself in power during the greater part of his long life, and we suppose must be considered to have been the most popular man in all England. He was a model representative of British hatred of the North during the late rebellion, and to him we are in great part indebted for the tricks of statesmanship which, added to natural British inclinations, raised such a clamor for war in 1861, and resulted in forcing upon us that most humiliating act, the surrender of Mason and Slidell. His successor is not yet named, though Earl Russell the present minister of Foreign Affairs is as likely as any one to succeed him.

The lower house of the Tennessee legislature has decided that no rebel shall collect debts from Union men.

Reports from last week's storm report a heavy fall of snow in Wisconsin and Minnesota, to the depth of six inches at La Crosse but that the snow was disappearing rapidly. The St Paul Press says that the storm there was a mixture of rain, sleet and snow, which raised the river three or four inches, greatly to the benefit of navigation. At Janesville Wisconsin, the fall of snow was sufficient to load down the trees and break many of them. At Davenport, Iowa, there was a light fall of snow, and at Burlington forty hours of continuous rain. It is rarely that snow has fallen thus early in the season, only two instances being on record at La Crosse.

One of the most fearful and heart rending accidents occurred last week in the planing mill of James A. Hair & Co., No. 437, Wells street, Chicago. A young man by the name of Henry Winfield, an employe in the mill, while in the act of taking a belt from a cylinder, which was rapidly revolving, caught his hand in the machinery, and it was torn from his arm, drawing the muscles and tendons down from the shoulder in the most frightful and horrifying manner. The hand and the cords which clung to it, was thrown to the ceiling by the rapidity of the revolving cylinder.

The latest samples of quartz from the Minnesota gold region, it is estimated will yield $100 to the ton.

Overland emigration to Oregon this year, is estimated at 10,000.

A letter has been received by a gentleman in New York from Capt. Hall, the Arctic explorer, dated August 20th, in which he says his expedition is progressing finely, and he is in hopes of finding some of the survivors of Sir John Franklin's party.

The workingmen of Washington recently made a grand demonstration in behalf of the eight hour system. Their procession was more than a mile in length.

The Secretary of the Treasury has decided to make a new issue of the five cent postal currency.

The rebellion in Haiti has terminated, the insurgents having agreed to surrender Cape Haitien to President Geffrard. The credit of bringing about this arrangment is given to U. S. consul Tolson.

The official order of Maximilian, ordering the assassination of every prisoner captured by his forces, has attracted the attention of the United States government, and it is thought some action will be taken on this matter at an early day.

It is rumored in Washington that the President has the case of Wirz under close advisement, with a view to mitigate as much as possible his punishment. Wirz having recovered from his indisposition, his diet is changed back to his regular army rations—a proceeding which meets with his decided disapprobation.

The Cholera has arrived in New York by the steamer Atlanta from Brest. She is now detained at quarantine in the lower bay. Ten deaths out of fifty or sixty cases occurred during the passage, and there have been nine more since her arrival.

The amount of gold in the United States treasury on the 31st ult., was $[illegible], fifty-five per cent. of all the vessels in process of construction on the Atlantic coast.

Capacity 800 barrels of flour per day.

A late invention is a self-fastening button, by which buttons are attached to any garment without the use of needle and thread. They can be instantly removed at will, and always stand straight and firm, never hanging half loose from the garment.

A countryman having partaken too freely of Pittsburg rum, while on a visit to that city, seated himself upon the curb-stone to sleep off his potations, when his head falling on one side, he was soon strangled to death by the tight buttoned neck band of his shirt.

—Joshua Watson of Scipio, La Porte Co., Indiana, raised this year 1,100 bushels of cranberries on a ten-acre marsh; cost of gathering and marketing $100; net profit, $4,500.

—A New York Paper says: "A person high in authority" asserts that it is all nonsense to elect members to the Legislature at Albany; for it is much cheaper to buy them after the election is over.

—A San Francisco dispatch of the 24th of Oct. gives the following particulars of yet further piracies committed by the Shenandoah: The Palmetto arrived yesterday, from Plover Bay Sept. 21st. She reports the capture of 24 whalers by the Shenandoah, which had been heard of at that port. All the names are included in lists hitherto telegraphed eastward. The last seen of the Shenandoah, by the ship Victoria, was in the early part of July, when steering south under full sail. During her operations she passed through Behring's Straits to the east cape where she burned nine whalers, presumed to be part of the twenty-four whose names were reported by the Palmetto.

—The proposed mustering out of the Veteran Reserve Corps has been through the advice of Gen. Grant reduced down to this: that those who wish it will be discharged, and those who do not will be retained. The different regiments are to be consolidated and the number of shoulder straps reduced. Congress will be asked to make it a permanent organization, into which men who have been wounded and desire to remain in the service, but who cannot enlist in the regular army, according to the regulations, on account of existing disabilities, will be admitted.

—Two Prussian officers, Capt. Calow and Major Von Shack, fought a duel recently at Magdeburg. They agreed to fight till one of them was killed, and twenty-eight shots were exchanged before Capt. Calow was fatally hit.

—The celebrated case of the burning of the steamer Martha Washington for the insurance money, has been paralleled by the burning of the steamer River Queen at Pittsburg. The steamer was new, and was owned by four men who did not pay the debts contracted in her construction, and she was attached for the claims. She was insured for $20,000, and one of the partners named Champlin conceived the idea of burning her, and carried his purpose into effect. Champlin's confession states how he burned the boat.

—A little boy in Indiana went off on horseback to drive up the cows. He tied the halter strap around his neck, and the horse became frightened and threw him off, and then kicked and dragged him to death. He was found horribly mangled.

—A codfish weighing 1½ stones, having in its stomach a pair of spectacles with brass frames, was caught about three miles from Flambro Head, by William Warcup, a fisherman of that place. We call that a fish story—but it was quite a spectacle if true.

—David W. Hill, a well known attorney at St. Louis, fell from a fourth story window on Monday night killing himself almost instantly.

—A little girl in Melrose, Mass., set fire to a small heap of grass, and while watching the blaze, fell into the fire, and was so severely burned that she lived but a few hours.

The other evening the bootblack, taking a paper from a newsboy in the snow-scene, read from the amusement column the announcement of every manager, "This establishment does not advertise in the Herald." The protracted and uproarious applause which followed showed the popularity of the cause of the managers in their war with the editor of the Herald.

THE RAILROADS IN THE TWO CAROLINAS.

The Trip from Raleigh to Charleston—The Pleasures and Pains of Railway Traveling—Detailed Statement of the Condition of the Roads and the Rolling Stock, and Suggestions for the Future.

Special Correspondence of the Chicago Tribune.

CHARLESTON, October 17th.

Let no man come into the Carolinas for a pleasure trip, as he would go into Canada or New England for the summer season. Enjoyment he may find, but it will be of an entirely different sort—as I can testify from an experience of six weeks, and about fifteen hundred miles travel.

FROM RALEIGH TO CHARLESTON.

The journey from Raleigh to Charleston furnishes the two extremes of Carolina railroad travel—the best and the worst. It is made over four different roads at an average rate of nine and three fourths miles per hour, and an average cost of six and one-third cents per mile, exclusive of meals.

From Raleigh to Goldsboro, a distance of forty-five miles, over the North Carolina road, the time is three hours, and the fare two dollars and a half. This is the fastest running, and the lowest fare in the two states. The cars are barely comfortable—measured even by the Carolina standard.

From Goldsboro to Wilmington, over the Wilmington and Weldon road, the distance is eighty-three miles, the time nine hours and a quarter, and the fare five dollars and a half. There is one train per day each way and the one train from Goldsboro for the South, leaves at the unfavorable hour of 9½ p. m. It was made up of half a dozen freight cars and one passenger car, and that night's ride brought the maximum of discomfort. The one car was crowded. Six persons of some special quality of blood, I suppose, were allowed to occupy one seat each, in spite of the remonstrances of several other persons of gentlemanly bearing, and they kept them in spite of the curses loud and deep of various other persons, who had, at least, paid full fare. I had a seat for about twenty miles, and then gave it up to a one-legged man—an ex-rebel soldier, I presume, and then sat and stood alternately, sharing the end of my valise hour after hour with a returning delegate to the State Convention. Much of our route lay through a low pine barren. The night was cool, the air was damp and penetrating, there was no fire in the cars, and two of the windows were missing. We had been out but an hour or so, when the water tank collapsed, and some ten gallons of water thereafter, coursed up and down the floor, until it gradually leaked through. Sometime about midnight, the brake of one of the freight cars dropped down. Fortunately none of the cars were thrown from the track.

The box of one wheel of our car was on fire two or three times and kept hot most of the night, so that the atmosphere of the car was further mixed with the smell of burning grease and packing. One box of the so-called "nigger car" was also on fire several times, and once the bottom of the car caught fire, to the alarm of such of the passengers as had not fallen into a worn out sleep. Finally a couple of hours before daylight we had to run the gauntlet of a mile of burning pine woods. There was no serious danger of fire to the train, but the black, pitchy smoke is something I do not care to encounter again. And all the delights of this night's travel were furnished for five dollars and a half each, payable in advance.

From Wilmington to Florence, by the Manchester & Wilmington road, the distance is 107 miles, the schedule time is twelve hours and the fare seven dollars and a half. Somebody by Bragg's order, having burned all the bridges near Wilmington, the cars are reached by a steamboat ride of eight miles—that is, if the steamboat is in working order, as it sometimes is. The morning when about thirty of us tumbled out of bed at five o'clock, in a furious northeast rain storm, and were hack-ed off to the wharf at an expense of two dollars per mile, was one of its "out-of-order" mornings, as we found after shivering in the open warehouse for an hour. At the end of that time, the Conductor, alike ignorant and unmindful of the intentions of the Superintendent, went off to breakfast—followed by about a dozen of his passengers. In the course of the morning, there was a great deal of "waiting on the Superintendent" on the part of several of the passengers. I believe he received them courteously and took the matter coolly. The assistant Superintendent on whom I called, is a pleasant fellow, and carries excellent cigars. I merely asked him if the road was paying well, and being answered "so-so," went on to talk with him about the price of cotton and the value of negro labor—concerning which he gave he gave me a great deal of valuable information I suppose—though unfortunately I don't remember what it was. However, the result of the united fretting of half a dozed persons was that the conductor and such of his passengers as had an extra three dollars, took hacks, crossed two ferries in two miserable old flatboats, drove two miles over a half submerged causeway, through a rice swamp, another mile through a pine barren, and so found the engineer and the fireman ready with the train. Instead of starting at six o'clock, we got off at half-past nine. By one o'clock we had made thirty-four miles and there we stopped for dinner—that is such of us as took things philosophically and had a dollar in change. We had a clean table-cloth—it was Monday—a cup of rye coffee and as much as twenty-five cents' worth of rice, mutton and corn bread. We had no supper that day. The company had failed to meet the last pay-day, and consequently the negroes were off work for the time being. There was much trouble at every station for water. At one place the train negroes were two hours pumping water enough for a twelve miles run. Finally we stopped in a swamp and the hands and some of the passengers formed a bucket-line and filled the old tender-box to the top. That brought us below the line of the strike, and we reached Florence eight hours and a half behind time. This was an exceptional day. The train isn't usually more than three or four hours late, and occasionally not more that one. There are but two trains on the road, and of course but one train per day. Hardee paid his respects to the bridge over the Great Pedee, and the crossing is effected by means of a great flat-boat, at a point where the river is not more that fifty or sixty yards wide. The bridge is likely to be rebuilt some time next year.

From Florence to Charleston by the North Eastern road the distance is 108 miles, the time nine and a half hours, and the fare six dollars. The road runs one freight train and one passenger train per day each way, and appears to be doing a good business. Its bridge at the Santee river was burned by panic-stricken rebels, and the crossing is made with the usual flat-boat. The rolling stock appears to be in better condition than on the road above.

RAILWAYS AND RAILWAY TRAVELING.

Since I left Charleston on the 7th of last month, I have traveled on nearly all the roads in North Carolina and South Carolina. I went up through central South Carolina and western North Carolina, eastward through northern and central South Carolina, and back through the eastern part of the two States. I have been neither specially fortunate nor unfortunate, and I speak from my own experiences only, so that I may speak with accuracy. Nor is there occasion to speak with a fault-finding spirit, but only that the picture of southern life may be brought nearer completion.

Let no one suppose that our forces are solely responsible for the destruction of the railroad system of the two states. There were two great lines of railroad here—one from Northeastern Georgia through Augusta and thence eastward by Branchville, Kingsville and Florence to Wilmington; and the other northward from Savannah, at a great or less distance from the coast, through Charleston and Florence to Wilmington and thence to Virginia. From Kingsville, the former cross-line, reaches out one arm southward to Charleston, and another northward into western North Carolina. This great easterly and westerly road was the artery of the Confederacy. When Sherman seized Atlanta, he grasped the end of it; when he swooped down on Columbia, he cut it in mid length. This is about all Sherman did—thoroughly cut the great cross-line. Stoneman struck the arm reaching northward from Kingston in several places, and destroyed two or three important bridges. There was method in the work of these two officers. On the other hand, Hardee and Bragg acted like wild men. Thus, they burned all the bridges east of Kingsville on the cross-line, and all those on the coast line between Wilmington and Charleston—why? asks Yankee and rebel in unison. It certainly was not done to prevent pursuit by Sherman, for he was not pursuing. In a word, our forces destroyed Railroads, and the rebels burned bridges. It was much easier for Sherman to build a temporary bridge than to lay a railroad, so the rebels did not adopt the surest way of preventing his pursuit. It is far easier for the railroad companies to lay track than to build bridges, and so Sherman's method not only broke up the rebel use of the roads, but left them in such a condition that their respective companies could more easily put them in working order. Hence, the cursing one hears from Southerners—and there is a great deal of it—is not of Sherman who destroyed track and accomplished a military purpose, but of Hardee and Bragg, who senselessly burned bridges and accomplished nothing.

The destruction of our army is nearly overcome—not obliterated, but so far overcome that travel is resumed on the several roads. At this writing, I believe there is less than forty miles out of use, and on this forty miles, work is progressing with commendable rapidity. Of the bridges burned by Stoneman, only that on the Catawba between Winnsboro and Charlotte remains unimpaired. On the other hand, the destruction of the rebel army will not be overcome for a dozen years. Thus, Wade Hampton burned the magnificent bridge at Columbia. Its loss delayed Sherman about twenty-five minutes! South Carolina cannot rebuild it unaided in this generation. Bragg burned the bridges at Wilmington; their loss worked us no serious injury, but they cannot be rebuilt under a year. Hardee burned the great bridges over the Santee and Great Pedee—their loss wasn't of the least consequence to us, but every passenger and every pound of freight on this great coast line of road, now crosses these rivers in flat-boats, and will continue to cross so for at least six months more.

Of all the roads in the two states, the North Carolina Central is the only one in the two states which runs two passenger trains per day, and this it does only over a short section of the route. On two roads there is a daily passenger train, and a daily freight train with passenger car attached. On all other lines there is a single train per day—each way of course—consisting of one or two passenger cars, and from two to eight freight cars. The rate of fare ranges from five to nine cents per mile, with an average of about six and a quarter cents. The actual running rate, including stoppages, is from ten to seventeen miles per hour, with an average progress, including stoppages, of about nine to ten miles per hour. Of course at such a rate of speed, there is next to no danger of accidents, and traveling is reasonably safe, even if it is exceedingly uncomfortable.

This slow rate of speed is necessitated by two causes, bad condition of the road, and bad condition of the cars and engines. The road-bed is generally in passably good order and could be put in first class condition at a comparatively small expense. The rails, however, are literally worn out, and before any great amount of work can be done on any road, every mile must be relaid with new iron. The wonder is, considering how much these two main lines were used by the rebel government, that it is now possible to use the roads at all. The chief difficulty, however, after all, is in connection with the rolling stock. Of this there is very little left, and what there is, is in the most wretched condition generally, imaginable. Except on the North Carolina road, their passenger cars are inferior to those on second-class emigrant trains at the North—in need alike of the painter, the glazier, the upholsterer and the scrubber. Even all these could not be able to restore more than three out of the ten. Three more of the ten might, perhaps, be put in serviceable order by a thorough overhauling at the shops. The remaining four, are utterly worn out, and would long ago have been condemned but for the absolute necessity of the situation. I have ridden in a dozen so far gone that I actually feared they would fall to pieces if a speed of sixteen miles an hour was attained. The box freight cars are, generally speaking, in somewhat better condition than the passenger cars. The engines on all the roads, without exception, are, so to speak, on their last legs, and most of them must soon be replaced by new ones. I rode with the engineer for ten miles on the Manchester road while he ran at the rate of a mile in three minutes and a half. I am sure I shall not repeat the experiment and I doubt if he will with that engine. His average rate is ten to ten and a half miles per hour.

The labor on the road is mostly done by negroes. The conductors, engineers and station-masters are, so far as I observed, white men, as are about one-third the firemen and brakemen. But two-thirds of the firemen and brakemen, and nearly all the numerous hands employed at the various stations along the road, are negroes; and to complaint is made but that they do the work well enough when they are promptly paid. It is a fact however, that they refuse to make long engagements. The stationmen very rarely remain more than two or three weeks in a place—Then their craving for novelty possesses them, and they are off for a new point, very likely to engage in the same business.

I have found almost everywhere that the roads had all the business they could do. The passenger travel is small—seventy-five persons per day on most of the roads, is above the average. The lines centering in Wilmington and Charleston are burdened with cotton—indeed they cannot carry all that is seeking transportation. In one place and another, I presume I have spoken with forty men or more who were urging shipment. At Orangeburg were men owning from fifty to one hundred bales, who had been dancing attendance upon the railroads for a month. At Florence, nearly the same state of things existed. So it did too, at Kingsville. There is also much freight coming from the north. Of course, as the rates of passenger travel indicate, freights are exceedingly high—at least double those on northern roads. The shippers scold and swear, but no one expects a reduction of rates at present.

The roads must be rebuilt and restocked by northern or foreign capitalists. That this can be done by the present owners, is utterly impossible. There is scarcely capital enough in the whole state of South Carolina to rebuild and refurnish one hundred and fifty miles of road. The earnings on most of the lines are proportionately large, but of course they are mainly swallowed up by the minor needful daily repairs. The cassis not one of argument—the refurnishing and rebuilding must soon be done and be done by outside capital.

Each road appears to be managed independently of all others, and I could not see that there is any effort to make what are called close connections at central points. At the terminus of each line, there must be something like twenty-four hours of waiting and the hotel expenses, before travel can be resumed on another line. There isn't a sleeping car or a railroad eating house in the two Carolinas. The North Carolina Central has been talking about a sleeping car and may put one or two on its line next spring. Travelers mostly carry their rations with them like soldiers, or go hungry. There is just as little regard as possible paid to the comfort of the passengers. Fortunately most of the lines are relatively short—yet you are carried over the road from Charleston to Florence, a ride of from 9 a. m., to 6½ p. m., in a fasting condition, unless you have your own basket of eatables; and on the line between Florence and Wilmington you are given breakfast at 8½, in the morning, and allowed nothing more till 6½ in the evening; and the run from 7 a. m. to 6 p. m., between Charleston and Kingston is made without any opportunity for dinner. Consequently most travelers carry a basket, and every true Southerner carries a bottle—with something in it when they start.

MAJ GEN. GEORGE H. THOMAS is congratulating himself on his successful strategy in escaping the lion-hunters. He has traveled from Nashville to New York, and through the principal cities on the Atlantic coast without suffering a single public reception. For the first time since the outbreak of the war, Gen. HON. F. J. MOSES is chosen President of the South Carolina Senate and Hon. A. P. Aldrich Speaker of the House. Captain Moses will be remembered by some as the loyal South Carolinian who fought a duel in Paris at the beginning of the war with a rebel Virginian named Farquar, who had made a sneering remark concerning the North. Capt. Moses was desperately wounded, but finally recovered. We believe his opponent was killed. The captain is a native of the State of Maine, but has lived for many years in South Carolina, and is married to a South Carolina wife.

THE present whereabouts of Samuel Cooper, Senior General in the rebel service, appears to be a mystery which neither he nor his friends care to develope. He left Richmond with Davis, and was a companion of that worthy in his flight to the vicinity of Augusta, where he parted company with him. At that time, Cooper had not a dollar in the world, and his companions with the exception of Davis, were nearly all in the same deplorable condition. He managed to borrow a few coins from his fellow fugitives and disappearing, has never since been heard from.

IT is stated that if plenty of good, strong green tea, well sweetened, be placed in an outer department accessible to flies, they will taste of it and be killed thereby, as surely as by the most approved poison. The remedy is simple and well worthy of trial.

A GOOD good story is told about the Rev. Robert J. Breckenridge, who was temporary chairman of the Baltimore Convention last year, and the late Thomas F. Marshall of Kentucky. Both wishing to establish a reputation in early life, measured lances with Henry Clay, and of course got the worst of it. A few years after, the two met—the latter being on one of his customary sprees. The lawyer exclaimed to the divine: "Ah! Bob, it was an unlucky day for us when we tilted against the Great Harry. It drove me to the bottle, and you to the pulpit, Bob; but I've stuck a d—d sight closer to my text than you have to yours."

WINE MAKING.—Wine is a thing not made by man at all, but only modified at most. It is a production of nature. In the purest and best grape wine, this is most remarkably exhibited. The grapes are easily pressed by a wine or even cider press, and can be kept separate from the lees, or allowed to ferment on them as strength is required. Not one drop of water, not a lump even of sugar is requisite, though most of the wines in this country are made with it. But the fermentation is all an act of nature herself. She it is who makes our wine, and all that men have to do while the fermentation is going on, in the juice, is to watch it and let it alone. And when this has ceased, the drawing off into a clean cask and keeping it undisturbed in quiet and perfect darkness by itself, is all that man can do. A lump of loaf-sugar in each bottle, may give a champagne freshness to it but the simpler, the purer, the less of cookery in wine, the better for it and those who have good taste enough to prefer it thus. The pure juice of grapes is best in sickness. The best of grapes, and if sugar be added, the best and purest sugar, should alone be used.—Philadelphia Ledger.

TO KEEP TIRES ON WHEELS.—Hear what a practical man says of this subject: "I ironed a wagon some years ago for my own use, and before putting on the tires I filled the felloes with linseed oil; and the tires have worn out and were never loose. I also ironed a buggy for my own use seven years ago, and the tires are as tight as when put on. My method of filling the felloes with oil is as follows: I use a long, cast-iron oil heater, made for the purpose. The oil is brought to a boiling heat, the wheel is placed on a stick so as to hang in the oil, each felloe an hour for a common sized felloe. The timber should be dry, as green timber will not take oil. Care should be taken that the oil does not get hotter than the boiling heat, in order that the timber be not burnt. Timber filled with oil is not susceptible to water, and is much more durable. I was amused some years ago when I told a blacksmith how to keep the tires tight on wheels, by his telling me that it was a profitable business to tighten tires; and the wagon-maker will say that it is profitable to him to repair wheels. But what will the farmer, who supports the wheelwright and smith say?

Star Freight's Pilgrimage.—Fifth Paper.

GALENA, ILLINOIS, October, 28, 1865.

Some eminent little poet was constrained to declare that—

"The snow, the snow! 'tis pleasant thing
To see it falling, falling
Down upon the earth with noiseless wing.
As at some spirit calling.
Each flake, in fair parachute,
From teeming clouds let down,
When earth is still, and air is mute
As Frost's enchanted zone."

There is "poetry into that," and perhaps there may be some truth at proper seasons. But if the rhymester had been "spat, spatting 'round like one goose," as I have all day, I'm thinking he would be inspired to pronounce snow in Galena in the month of October, an unmitigated humbug. Four days of rain, to close up with four inches of snow, results in about fourteen inches of splash, slush and sich. Does the reader care to know

DRIFTING.

BY THOMAS BUCHANAN READ.

My soul to-day
Is far away
Sailing the Vesuvian Bay;
My winged boat,
A bird afloat,
Swims round the purple peaks remote:

Round purple peaks
It sails and seeks
Blue inlets and their crystal creeks;
Where high rocks throw
Through deeps below,
A duplicated golden glow.

Far, vague and dim,
The mountains swim;
While on Vesuvius' misty brim,
With outstretched hands,
The grey smoke stands,
O'erlooking the volcanic lands.

Here Ischia smiles
O'er liquid miles;
And yonder, bluest of the isles,
Calm Capri waits,
Her sapphire gates
Beguiling to her bright estates.

I heed not if
My rippling skiff
Float swift or slow from cliff to cliff;
With dreamful eyes
My spirit lies
Under the walls of Paradise.

Under the walls
Where swells and falls
The Bay's deep breast at intervals,
At peace I lie,
Blown softly by,
A cloud upon this liquid sky.

This day so mild
Is Heaven's own child,
With Earth and Ocean reconciled;
The airs I feel
Around me steal,
Are murmuring to the murmuring keel.

Over the rail
My hand I trail
Within the shadow of the sail;
A joy intense
The cooling sense
Glides down my drowsy indolence:

With dreamful eyes
My spirit lies
Where summer sings and never dies—
O'ercrelled with vines
She grows and shines
Among her future oil and wines:

Her children hid
The cliffs amid,
Are gamboling with the gamboling kid;
Or down the walls,
With tipsy calls,
Laugh on the rocks like waterfalls.

The fisher's child,
With tresses wild,
Into the smooth, bright sand beguiled,
With glowing lips
Sings as she skips,
Or goes at the far off ships.

Yon deep bark goes
Where traffic blows
From lands of sun to lands of snows;
This happier one,
Its course is run
From lands of snow to lands of sun.

O! happy ship
To ride and dip,
With blue crystal at your lip!
O! happy crew,
My heart with you
Sails, and calls, and sings anew!

No more, no more,
This worldly shore
Upbraids me with its wild uproar;
With dreamful eyes
My spirit lies
Under the walls of Paradise.

Why the Putkammer Castle was Destroyed.

[The following interesting sketch from the Atlantic Monthly for November, is understood to be from the pen of the well-known ROBERT DALE OWEN.]

THERE is a test of truth in popular creeds and in human opinions generally which is prominently put forward by Herbert Spencer, and has been more or less distinctly stated by other writers, long before our time—a very searching and trustworthy test.

It is, in substance, this:—Whatever doctrine or opinion has received, throughout a long succession of centuries, the common assent of mankind, may be properly set down as being, if not absolutely true in its usually received form, yet founded on truth, and having, at least, a great, undeniable verity thus underlies it.

If, however, there be conflicting details as to any doctrine, varying in form according to the sect or the nation that entertains it, then the test is to be received as affirming the grand underlying truth, but not as proving any of the conflicting varieties of investment in which particular sects or nations may choose to clothe it.

Thus the world's belief in the reality of another life, and in the doctrine of future reward and punishment.

In some form or other, such a faith has existed in every age and among almost every people. Charon and his boat might be the means of conveyance. Or the believer, dying in battle for the creed of the Faithful, might expect to wake up in a celestial harem peopled with Houris. Or the belief might embody the matchless horrors painted by Dante; his dolorous city with the terrible inscription over the entrance-gate: "Lasciate ogni speranza, voi ch' entrate."

Again, the conception might be of a long unconscious interval after death, succeeded at last by a resuscitation; or it might be of another world, the supplement and immediate continuation of this, into which Death, herald, not destroyer, ushers us even while human friends are yet closing our eyes and composing our limbs. It might be of the Paradise in which, on the very day of the crucifixion, the penitent thief was to meet the Saviour of mankind; or it might be that Heaven, yet increate or unpeopled, seen by some in long, distant perspective, shadowed forth in such lines as these:—

"That man, when laid in lonesome grave,
Shall sleep in Death's dark gloom,
Until the eternal morning wake
The slumbers of the tomb."

Yet again, the idea may be of a Future of which the denizens shall be, on some Great Day, tried as before an earthly court, doomed by an earthly tribunal, and sentence pronounced against them by a presiding God, who, of his own omnipotent will, decides to inflict upon sinners condign punishment, in measure far beyond all earthly severity,—torment in unquenchable flames, with no drop of water to cool the parched tongue, for ever and ever.

In other words, we may conceive, as to human destiny for another world, either of punishments optional and arbitrary, growing out of the imagination of an offended Judge who inflicted requites sin, or of punishments natural and inherent, growing out of and very nature of the sin itself, as delirium tremens requites a long career of intemperance. We may conceive of punishments which are the awards of judicial vengeance; we may believe in those only which are the inevitable results of eternal and immutable law, a necessary sequence in the next life to the bad passions and evil deeds of this.

Those who incline to this latter aspect of the Great Future, as the scene of reward or punishment supervening in the natural order of things, may chance to find interest, beyond mere curiosity, in the following strange narrative.

There is not, perhaps, a country more rife in legends of haunted houses than Germany. No province but has its store of them. Many, drawn by tradition from the obscurity of the past, have lost, if they ever possessed, any claim to be regarded except as apocryphal. But others, of a recent date and better attested, cannot be disposed of in so summary a manner.

In furnishing a specimen of this latter class, I depart from a rule which I think it well to observe in regard to original narratives of character so marvellous: to record such, namely, only when they can be procured direct from the lips of the witnesses themselves. This came to me second hand. I had no opportunity of cross-questioning the actors in the scenes narrated. Yet I had the story from a gentleman of high respectability: the principal Secretary of the ——— Legation at Naples; and his sources of information were direct and authentic.

In the southeastern portion of Pomerania, at no great distance from the frontier of the province of West Prussia, and in the vicinity of the small town of Butow, there stood, not many years since, an ancient chateau. It was the ancestral residence of an old Pomeranian family of baronial rank; and the narrative of its destruction, with the causes that led thereto, is curious and remarkable.

Its former owner, the Baron von Putkammer, after leading a wild and dissolute life, had expired within its walls. For years previously, many a mysterious story, fraught with dark hints of seduction and infanticide, had been whispered over the surrounding country; and when at last death arrested the Baron's profligate career, some reported that he had been strangled in requital of outrage committed,—others that the Devil had taken home his own, as they had long expected.

His estate went to a relative of the same name, who granted the enjoyment of it to his eldest son, heir to the title. This young man, after a time, arrived to take possession. He found in the chateau the administrator of the deceased Baron's estate.

It was late, the first night, before he went to bed. Yet he was scarcely undressed, when he heard, through the stillness of the night, the approach of a carriage, at first rolling over the sharp gravel of the avenue, then entering the paved court-yard. This was succeeded by the noise of the front door opening, and the distinct sound of steps on the principal staircase.

Young Putkammer, surprised at this unseasonable visit, yet supposing it some friend who had been benighted, hastily donned his dressing-gown, and, with light in hand, stepped to the landing. Nothing could be seen there! But he heard behind him the opening of a door leading into the principal gallery of the chateau—a long hall which for some time had been out of use. It had been employed by the former owner of the castle as a banqueting-room, was hung with old family portraits, and, as the young man had noticed during the day, was so completely incumbered with furniture, which had been temporarily stored there, that no one could pass through it.

He returned in great surprise, which was much increased when he found the door of the gallery in question closed and locked. He listened, and heard quite distinctly, within the room, the noise of plates and dishes and the clatter of knives and forks. To this, after a time, succeeded the sound of shuffling cards and the rattle of money, as if thrown on the table in the course of the game.

More and more astonished, he awoke his servant, and bade him listen at the door and tell him what he heard. The terrified valet reported the same sounds which had reached his master's ears. Thereupon the latter told him to arouse the administrator and request his presence.

When this gentleman appeared, the young nobleman eagerly asked if he could furnish any explanation of this strange disturbance.

"I was unwilling," said he, in reply, "to anticipate what you now witness, lest you might imagine I had some interested motive to prevent your coming hither. We are all familiar with these sounds. They occur every night at about the same hour. And we have sought in vain any natural explanation of their constant recurrence."

"Have you the key of the gallery?"

"Here it is."

The door was unlocked and thrown open. Silence and darkness! And when the lights were introduced, not an object was to be seen through the gloom but the old furniture confusedly piled up over the floor.

They closed and locked the door. Again the same sounds commenced: the clatter of dishes, the noise of revelling, the clink of gamblers' gold. A second time they opened the door, and this time quickly and suddenly, and a second time the sounds instantly ceased, and the hall, untenanted except by the silent portraits on its walls, appeared before them, the same still and gloomy lumber-room as before.

Baffled for the time, young Putkammer dismissed his attendants and retired to his chamber. Ere long he heard the door of the gallery open, the heavy footsteps sound on the stairway, the front door creak on its hinges,—and then the roll of the carriage, first over the stone pavement, then along the gravelled avenue, till the sounds gradually died away in the distance.

The next night he was ready dressed and prepared with lights. When, about the same hour, the noise of the approaching carriage was heard, he had the lights immediately carried to the top of the stairway, and he himself half descended the stairs. Up the stairs and past his very side came the footsteps; but neither living being nor spectral form could he perceive.

The same noises in the old banqueting hall. The same fruitless attempts to witness the revel, or to get at the secret, if any, of the imposition.

The young man was brave and devoid of superstition. Yet, in spite of himself, these mysterious sounds, renewed night after night, irritated his nerves, and preyed upon his quiet. He thought to break through the spell by inviting a party of living guests. They came, to the number of thirty or forty; but not for their presence did the invisible revellers intermit their nocturnal visit. All heard the approach of the carriage, the steps ascending the staircase, the sounds of revelry in the hall. And all, when the opened door disclosed, as wont, but darkness and silence, turned away with a shudder,—and to the subsequent invitation of their host to favor him again with their company replied with some shallow apology, which he perfectly understood.

Thus deserted by his friends, and subjected, night after night, to the same ghastly annoyance, the young man found his health beginning to suffer, and decided to endure it no longer.

Returning to his father, he informed him that he would receive with gratitude the rents of the property, but only on condition that he was not required to reside in its haunted chateau.

The father, ridiculing what he termed his son's superstitious weakness, declared that he would himself take up his residence there for a time, assured that he could not fail to discover the true cause of the sounds that driven off its former occupants.

But the result belied his expectations. Like his son, he never could see anything. But the selfsame sounds nightly assailed his ears. He caused the hall to be cleared out and occupied daily. So long as it was lighted and there was any one within it, no sounds were heard; and by thus occupying it all night, the disturbance could be averted. But as often as it was closed or left in darkness, the invisible revel recommenced at the wonted hour, preceded by the same preliminaries, terminating in the same manner.

Nothing was left untried to penetrate the mystery, and to detect the trick, if to trickery the disturbances were due. But every effort to obtain an explanation of the phenomena utterly failed. And the father, like the son, after a few weeks' struggle against the nightly annoyance, found his nervous system unable to cope with the constant strain upon it, and left the chateau, determined never again to enter its walls.

The next expedient was to rent it to those whom the fame of its ghostly reputation had not reached. But this was unavailing, except for a brief season. No tenant would remain beyond a week or ten days. This plan, therefore, was abandoned in despair; the principal rooms were closed; and the building remained for years untenanted, except by one or two unwilling dependants.

Finally the proprietor, deeming all change hopeless, and finding that the keeping up of the chateau was a mere useless expense, resolved to destroy it. The dead had fairly driven out the living. He had it pulled down; and a few low, ruined walls alone remained to mark the place where it stood.

Still, even within these deserted ruins, the same sounds of nightly revelry were declared to have been heard by those who were bold enough to approach them at the midnight hour. When this was reported to the proprietor, he determined, if possible, to outroot this last remnant of disturbance. Accordingly, he caused to be erected, out of the remaining materials of the chateau and on the spot where it had stood, a small chapel, now to be found there, a mute witness of the story I have here told.

The chapel was completed in 1834. Even while the rites attending its consecration were in progress, strange and unwonted noises disturbed the congregation; but from that time on they ceased; and the chapel has since been entirely free from any such.

A relative of the proprietor, a young officer in the Prussian army, was present at the consecration, himself witnessed the noises in question, and had previously heard from the parties themselves, all the former occurrences. He it was who related the circumstances to my informant, the Baron von P———, a gentleman of a grave and earnest character, whose manner, in repeating them to me, evinced sincerity and conviction. But it is not merely upon his authority that the details of the narrative rest. They are, it would seem, of public notoriety in Pomerania; and hundreds of persons in the neighborhood, as my informant declared, can yet be found to testify, from personal observation, to the general accuracy of the above narration.*

The most salient point in this story is the practical and business part of it—the actual pulling down of the chateau, as a last resort, to get rid of the disturbance. Mere fancy is not wont to lead to such a result as that. The owner of a piece of valuable property is not likely to destroy it for imaginary cause. Interest is a marvellous quickener of the wits, and may be supposed to have left no stone unturned, before assenting to such a sacrifice.

I inquired of the gentleman to whom I am indebted for the above narrative if there were no skeptical surmises in regard to the origin of the disturbance. He replied, that he had heard but one—namely, that the administrator of the deceased Baron's estate might, from motives of interest and to have the field to himself, have resorted to a trick to scare the owners from the premises.

It is beyond a doubt that such devices have been successfully employed ere now for similar purpose. An example may be found in the story of the monks of St. Bruno, and the shrewd device they employed to obtain from King Louis the Saint the grant of one of his ancestral palaces. It was in this wise.

Having heard his confessor speak in high terms of the goodness and learning of the monks of St. Bruno, the King expressed a desire to found a community of them near Paris. Bernard de la Tour, the superior, sent six of the brethren, and Louis assigned to them, as residence, a handsome dwelling in the village of Chantilly. It so happened, that from their windows they had a fine view of the old palace of Vauvert, originally erected for a royal residence by King Robert, but which had been deserted for years. The worthy monks, oblivious of the Tenth Commandment, may have thought the place would suit them; but ashamed, probably, to make a formal demand of it from the King, they seem to have set their wits to work to procure it by stratagem.

At all events, the palace of Vauvert, which had never labored under any imputation against its character until they became its neighbors, began almost immediately afterwards to acquire a bad name. Frightful shrieks were heard to proceed thence at night. Blue, red, and green lights were seen to glimmer from its casements, and then suddenly disappear. The clanking of chains succeeded, together with the howlings of persons as in great pain. Then a ghastly spectre, in pea-green, with long, white beard and serpent's tail, appeared at the principal windows, shaking his fist at passers-by. This went on for months.

The King, to whom these wonders were duly reported, deplored the scandal, and sent commissioners to look into the affair. To these the six monks of Chantilly, indignant that the Devil should play such pranks before their very faces, suggested that, if they could but have the palace as a residence, they would undertake speedily to cure it of all ghostly intrusion. A deed, with the royal sign-manual, conveyed Vauvert to the monks of St. Bruno. It bears the date of 1259. From that time all disturbances ceased—the green ghost, according to the creed of the pious, being laid to rest forever under the waters of the Red Sea.†

Some will surmise that the story of the castle of Putkammer is but a modified version of that of the palace of Vauvert. One who was not on the spot, to witness the phenomena and personally to verify all the details, cannot rationally deny the possibility of such a hypothesis. Yet I find little parallel between the cases, and difficulties, apparently insuperable, in the way of accepting such a solution of the mystery.

The French palace was deserted, and nothing was easier than to play off there, unchallenged, such commonplace tricks as the showing of colored lights, the clanking of chains, shrieks, groans, and a howling spectre with beard and tail—all in accordance with the prejudices of that age; nor do we read that any one was bold enough to penetrate, during the night, into the scene of the disturbance; nor had the King's commissioners any personal motive to urge a thorough research; nor had a pious sovereign, the owner of a dozen palaces, any strong inducement to refuse the cession of one of these, already untenanted and useless, to certain holy men, the objects of his veneration.

Very different, in every respect, is the affair of the Pomeranian castle. It is a narrative of the skeptical nineteenth century, that sets down all ghost stories as nursery tales. The owner, and his son, the future possessor, each at separate times and for weeks, reside in the castle, and occupy themselves in repeated attempts to discover whether they have been imposed on. The self-same trick, if trick it was, is repeated night after night, without variation. The roll of the approaching carriage-wheels, first along the gravelled avenue, then over the paved court-yard, while no carriage is visible,—how were such sounds to be imitated? The fall of the footsteps, unaccompanied by aught in bodily form, up the lighted stairway, and past the very side of the bold youth who stepped down to meet them,—what human device could successfully simulate these? The sound of the opening gallery door and the noises of the midnight orgies, with full opportunity to examine every nook and corner of the scene whence they came,—how, in reproducing these, could trickery, time after time, escape detection? Both father and son, it is evident, had their suspicions aroused; and both, as evidently, were men of courage, not to be blinded by superstitious panic. Is it a probable thing that they would destroy an old and valued family mansion, without having exhausted every conceivable expedient to detect imposture?

Nor was this imposture, if as such we are to regard it, conducted in approved form, after the orthodox fashion. It assumed a shape contrary to the usually received ideas. No spectre clanking its chains; no lights burning blue; no groans of the tormented; no ordinary getting-up of a ghostly disturbance. But a mere succession of sounds, indicating, if we are to receive and interpret them literally, the periodical return from the world of spirits of some of its tenants, restless and unblest. Was this the machinery a mystifier was likely to select?

Such are the difficulties that attend the hypothesis of a concerted plan of deception. They will be overlooked by those who have made up their minds that communications between this world and the next are impossible, and who will content themselves with pronouncing, that, though they cannot detect the mode of imposture, yet imposture of some kind or other it plainly must have been.

And such skeptics will very properly remind us of other difficulties in the way of accepting as a reality the alleged phenomena. What have the spirits of the departed to do with conveyances resembling those of earthly structure? Are there incorporeal carriages and horses? Can grave men admit such fancies as these?‡ Or is all this, even if genuine, only symbolical,—sounds without objective counterpart? Then what becomes of the positive character of this narrative, as a lesson, as a warning to us? The whole degenerates into an acted parable. It fades into the idle pageantry of a dream. Thus we lose ourselves in shadowy conjecture.

But, none the less, the facts, if facts they be, remain to be dealt with. And if at last we concede to the ultramundane origin of these manifestations, whether as objective reality or only as truth-teaching allegory, what a field is opened to our speculations regarding the realms of spirit and the possible punishments there in store for those who, by degrading their natures in this world, may have rendered themselves unfit for happiness in the next,—and who, perhaps, still attracted to earth by the debasing excesses they once mistook for pleasure, may be doomed, in the phantom repetition of their sins, to detect their naked reality, to have stamped on their consciousness the vileness of these without the brutal gratifications that veiled it, the essence of vice shorn of its sensual halo, the grossness without the glitter: if so, a terrible expiation!

I beg it may not be imagined, that, because I see grave difficulties in the way of regarding this case as one of imposture, I therefore set it up as proof of a novel theory regarding future punishments. A structure so great cannot be erected on foundation so slender. I but furnish it as a chance contribution towards the probabilities of ultramundane intercourse, — as material for thought,—as one of those hints which future facts may render valueless, but which, on the other hand, other observed phenomena may possibly serve to work out and corroborate and explain.

How to Avoid Cholera.

At a meeting of the New York Health Commissioners, a few days since, Dr. Sayres, of Brooklyn, gave the following general rules for the treatment of cholera patients: "Great fear and anxiety had a great deal to do in the prostration and spread of disease, and influenced the physical condition to such a degree as to make persons more subject to it than they would otherwise be. He thought if the people understood the single fact that the cholera is not necessarily a fatal disease, and that it always is preceded by certain premonitory symptoms, such as lassitude, great languor, debility and a diarrhœa, and that in this stage of the disease it is nearly always curable, if the proper precautionary measures are taken, it would tend to allay the popular terror. At this stage of the disease, it is of the first importance to pay attention to the first symptom, which is diarrhœa. At the very first approach, the patient should assume a horizontal posture and retain it, with the hips higher than the shoulders, and under no circumstances assume the perpendicular, even for a moment. Absolute, positive rest is needed, the body being kept in a warm condition. Any artificial means can be used for that which may be necessary. The main thing is the horizontal position, and perfect rest at the very commencement of the disease. If the patient is down stairs when taken, let him stay there or be carried up; but do not let him walk up. If he is out visiting, let him stay at his friend's house. Keeping this position for forty-eight hours, in the majority of instances, the disease will pass over, and the patient, on recovery, need make no very great changes in his mode of life. Of course, if he has bad habits, he should reform them; eat and drink rationally, and attend to business as usual, but not overdo himself. In the present state of the atmosphere, when pestilence is abroad, the system is rendered more liable to exhaustion, and he should husband his strength by avoiding violent exercise. With these few precautionary measures, and a proper sanitary condition of the city, and a rigid enforcement of quarantine, we may hope to escape any pestilential epidemic."

"I Call You."

Not long since at eminent divine in the state of Illinois (it won't do to mention dates, names or places), visited a distant town for the purpose of preaching the dedicatory sermon in a new church. Court was in session and on Saturday evening the judge and lawyers congregated in a room and amused themselves by card playing and story telling. The divine, at the request of F., a lawyer, visited the room. Coming upon the group so suddenly, they were unable to hide their cards and w———y. The divine looked on awhile, and then raising his hat, invited the gentlemen present to attend the church next day and hear him preach. This they agreed to do, and Sunday found judge and lawyers seated in the "amen corner."

The sermon over, the minister announced: "Friends, the citizens of this town have built a fine church; there is still $1,500 due. We propose to raise the money by subscription to-day, and (easing the judge) I go one hundred dollars! Who goes better?" The judge, glancing at the lawyers, slowly responded, "I see your hundred." "Thank you, brother," said the divine; "will any one raise it?" looking at the same time at lawyer No. 1. The lawyer saw he was in for it, and quietly responded, "I go a hundred blind," and so on through the list. The divine raked down the bar and their money, until the scene closed by a sharp, shrill voice, announcing, "I see the last hundred and call you!"

Our readers can imagine the astonishment of that congregation. We venture, however, that those lawyers will not again invite the divines to witness a "social game of whist," where men "see" each other, "go it blind, and call the hand."

Muscular Labor.

An English stage-horse used to work eight miles per day, which he ran in about one hour—the average speed, stops included, being seven and a half miles per hour. A wagon horse travels 20 miles per day, and works eight hours. These rates were found by experience to be the most economical. An engineer, a few years ago, tried the effect of increasing the work of horses from about 40,000 to 44,000 lbs. lifted 1 foot per minute; the result was that in less than 3 months out of 30 horses 21 died. Watts finding that the best horses working 6 hours per day could lift 33,000 lbs. 1 foot per minute, adopted that as the horse-power; but the general practice is to work 8 hours and lift 22,000 lbs. 1 foot per minute; and this is all that ordinary horses can do without wearing out so fast as to make an increase of work more costly than the rate.

The rate at which men can work has not been so carefully ascertained; but we have had sensational reports, that in Cuba, slaves and coolies have been worn out in seven years. It would be a service to science and humanity if the medical officers of armies and navies would keep careful records of the labor of men under their charge, and report to the Smithsonian Institute; and if railway companies and great industrial establishments would employ physicians to watch over the health of their people, and attend gratis, and employ their leisure in keeping such records, it might help to build up a reliable hygienic science, on which an improved practice might be founded.

The introduction of machines to relieve men from the expenditure of muscular power has already done much to increase the duration of their powers. A man at a planing machine is a man of leisure compared with the man that chipped and filed to produce plane surfaces, within forty years or less. The small steam hammers now coming into use give immense relief to the muscles of forge-men; and there is a rapid increase of machines to substitute the power of steam for that of muscle.

The fatigue and exhaustion of power, and the wear that tends to shorten life are now very much less than they were when we first saw machine shops. Then men had to do work like horses; now they do little more than superintend the working machine-tools. Then they were more worn in two hours than they now are in ten hours, upon the main operations of finishing.

Thus there is a constant diminution of hard labor. But still we have much more to do in this way. Men at the vice have often hard work with the chisel and file, which ought to be done by shaping tools, and probably will be. Forge-men still work hard. In fact, some men in a machine establishment really do three or four times as much hard work as others. A man at a lathe or planer, on light work, can endure 14 hours work per day with less effect on his constitution than 6 hours at a forge would have.

There is no good reason why men should not use seats more than they do when attending machine tools. Proprietors would do well to provide good seats, to be used freely when there is no necessity to stand.

A horse that is run too fast, or too much loaded, is soon worn out, and dies; three years is the average in stage service; but one that is moderately worked will last ten years; so, if a man works with all his energy many hours per day, he will soon wear out. Laboring men in England, according to statistics, do not sustain nearly to the age of professional men and men of leisure. But if too much work shortens life, too little or insufficient exercise is generally supposed to have the like effect.* What we do not yet know is the approximate amount of labor which is best for health and longevity. Perhaps it might be six hours for the man who does very hard work, and twelve for one who does light work.

But the question is not an abstracted one, applicable to men who can work little or much, as they choose; it is a practical question to men who have to earn their living; and in the solution of it we have to consider whether it is best to labor moderately, and live in an unhealthy tenement house, or to labor up to the maximum power consistent with health, and earn enough to live in a healthy house and region, and buy good food, clothing, and other means of health. Probably, a man with three or four dollars additional wages earned by working more hours, and spent in additional means of health, will preserve his own health and that of his family and live longer and have more enjoyment than he could have had with less work. This we must consider. We have a constant complaint from the newspapers,—which echo the voice of the people, so far as we know—the condition of our cities and towns is so bad that a vast amount of time is lost in sickness; and the deaths in some locations is more than double what it is in others. Now it will cost extra work to make this condition better; and we have to consider whether to lessen the hours of work, and be slow in improving the cleanliness and healthiness of the place we live in, or to keep up or increase the hours of work, so that we may earn means to avoid the causes of sickness and premature death. And this is the only way that men can get only what they earn; no contrivance will long enable any class to get high wages for little work while others are not doing as well. We have simply to inquire how it will do for all men to shorten their work. There is a time of work which will give a maximum product—a maximum of enjoyment, if men work less they will, on the whole, fall short of the greatest good.

Some may make up by gambling in various forms, and many more may hope to do so; but those who are not gamblers by trade will be the losers by this method of making up for lack of industry.

But one thing is certain, mechanics that work twenty hours will earn nearly twice as as much as those those that work ten hours. And if we get plenty of machines, they will lessen our hard work. In fact, it is by invention that we shall lessen our labor.—American Artisan.

Terrible Steamboat Explosion.

Shocking and Heartrending Scenes.

Many of our readers will remember the account given during the past summer of the launch of the splendid new Hudson River steamer, "St. John," of the "People's Line," the largest river steamer yet built in America. It is upon this boat that one of the most horrible accidents of the year happened on Sunday morning, Oct. 29th. The boat was just passing Twentieth street, on the trip down from Albany to New York, the passengers being nearly all in their berths asleep, when, at precisely 6:30, a

TERRIFIC EXPLOSION

was heard, the cabins were filled with hot, hissing steam; the floors were flooded with boiling water, and a rush of mighty, roaring waves shook the steamer from end to end. Quick as thought, the loosened steam with all its mighty power, tore down a portion of the steamer's side, broke into a thousand splinters the partitions between rooms Nos. 121 and 123, smashed into fragments the furniture, scalded and burned and mutilated the bodies of a lady and two sleeping children in one room, bruised and mangled and slew a mother and infant in the other; whirled swiftly through the upper ceiling, uprooting the flooring of room No. 41, seized the occupant of the lower berth, enveloping him in its blistering folds, filled his lungs with its torturing heat, drove the life from him, and then passing with fearful violence into the adjoining room, No. 42, it lasted the sleeping form of a wife whose husband was by her side, separating forever and in the most marked and terrible manner, those whom God had joined together. While the crash of broken glass and fractured furniture above, drowned the death shrieks of these victims, the passengers in their rooms, awakened by the noise and frightened by the tumult, jumped hastily from their berths and rushed recklessly and foolishly for the saloon. The majority of them were in their night-dresses, and with uncovered feet, stepped into with which the cabins were flooded, and opened their lungs for the inhalation of the scalding steam.

Of the horrible sights to be seen after the accident, one account speaks as follows: Led by curiosity, we walked toward the pillar, when our footsteps were stopped by a dreadful sight, upon which no living man could look unpaled. A large white cloth, curiously outlined with elevations and depressions, spotted with blood stains, darkened with matter and smeared with gore, suggested a more terrible revelation. Just then a brother in search of a sister came to see if she was there; the sheet was raised, and oh, dreadful sight, the victims of the slaughter lay before us. No battle-field could exhibit such mutilation, no thicket inhabited by wild beast could boast more perfect disfiguration. The steam in its operation must have been instantaneous, and death most likely carried off a victim ere a second's agony had followed the blow of the assailant. No one of the adults lay straight out, but with clenched fist, uplifted knee, bloated countenance, disfigured features, and in most instances, with skin entirely peeled away, they lay, hideous and repulsive. More touching than pen can paint was the lifeless forms of three little ones, that unconsciously kept their mother's company to the unknown shore beyond. One pretty child, not more than three years of age, with tiny hands outstretched, alone preserved the semblance even of humanity: upon the rest we gladly drop the cloth of forgetfulness.

Turning from this tableau of the dead, rigid and terrible, we were attracted by the screams and moans of

THE BAGGAGE MASTER,

Mr. Addison Searle, who lay stretched upon a blood stained mattress in the further corner. The poor fellow's head and face was a mass of cuts and bruises and blisters. His head was tied and bandaged, and his body comfortably covered with blankets. If he raved it was with much good sense, for his constant utterance was prayerful. While we stood near him, we were the unwilling witness of a most one of those normal, but hardly necessary sequences to troubles of this character. The friends of Mr Searle, instead of waiting until his wounds were properly dressed, his blood washed away and he ready for removal, hastened to his wife with the tidings of his condition. Instantly she determined to see him, and it was of her interview with him that we spoke. Wildly entering the saloon she rushed with all the fervor of affection to his couch, and throwing herself upon him, cried in the bitterness of her sorrow, with utterances that were heart-rending to the hearers and exciting to the sufferer, who turned and tossed in helpless wretchedness.

HEART-RENDING SCENE,

One man escaped the boiling water that was flooding the cabin, by grasping the chandelier and raising himself on its arms. Among those who were scalded to death was a newly-married pair, returning from their bridal tour. They had been married at St. Luke's Church, in New York, on the Thursday previous by the Reverend J. H. Tuttle. On Tuesday following, their funeral obsequies were solemnized in the same place by the same clergyman. In all some eleven persons were killed, and fourteen severely wounded.

The Science of Health!

Every Man his own Physician.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS,

AND

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

Disorders of the stomach, Liver & Bowels.

The Stomach is the great centre which influences the health or the disease of the system—Abused or debilitated by excess—indigestion, offensive breath and physical prostration are the natural consequences. Allied to the brain, it is the source of headaches, mental depression, nervous complaints and unrefreshing sleep. The liver becomes affected and generates bilious disorders, pains in the side &c. The Bowels sympathize by Costiveness, Diarrhoea and Dysentry. The principal action of these Pillsis on the stomach, and the liver, lungs, bowels and kidneys participate in their recuperative and regenerative operation.

Erysipelas and Salt Rheum.

Are two of the most common and virulent disorders prevalent on this continent, to these the Ointment is especially antagonistic its "modus operandi" is first to eradicate the venom and then complete the cure.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Ulcers.

Cases of many years' standing, that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions on the Skin.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic diseases, are eradicated and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Female Complaints.

Whether in the young or old, married or single, at the dawn of Womanhood, or the turn of life, these tonic medicines display so decided an influence that a marked improvement is soon perceptible in the health of the patient. Being a purely vegetable preparation, they are safe and reliable remedy for all classes of females in every condition of health and station of life.

Piles and Fistula

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healing qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills should be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Mercurial Eruptions,	Swelled Glands
Sprains,	Burns,	Piles,
Sore Legs,	Stiff Joints,	Chapped Hands
Tetter,	Rheumatism,	Sore Breasts,
Chilblains,	Ringworm,	Sore Heads,
Ulcers,	Fistula,	Sore Throats,
Gout,	Salt Rheum,	Scalds,
Lumbago,	Scres of all kinds,	Skin Diseases
Wounds of all kinds.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernable as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same knowing them to be spurious.

Advantages of this Plow.

It will last from three to six times longer than any other Steel Plow made anywhere by anybody. This has often been proved by actual use in "gritty" soils, occasionally to be found on the margins of streams in the West, in which sheet-steel Plows have been habitually "cut through" in plowing eighty rods or less, it having already plowed over three hundred acres of the same soil without yet being half worn.

It will "scour" in the most difficult soils, where all other Plows have failed. If there is a rod of ground anywhere in which it will not scour, we have yet to find it.

It draws lighter than any other Plow while cutting the same width and depth.

The Share can be sharpened, or a Point welded on, as readily as on ordinary Plows, by any blacksmith who understands his trade, as the steel is perfectly malleable, and works "kindly".

Any section can be replaced by a duplicate, to be had of any Agent, as the Share, Landside and Mouldboar is are cast in moulds

It is well stocked with New England second growth timber, and the standard is wrought iron, with "slots" in the cap so as to give or take land at pleasure

It plows at any depth, from three to twelve inches, works perfectly in either stubble or turf, leaves a clean furrow, and turns under stubble and foul trash completely

☞ It is the cheapest Plow in the world, just as sure as there is economy in paying six dollars once rather than five dollars five or six times over; — in not losing time and your temper because your Plow won't "scour;" — and in doing a quarter or a fifth more work, with the same power. The quality and quantity of work it will endure to perform must be considered, as well as the cost, in determining whether or not the Plow is cheap. Plows are used for profit, and the one cost of which the most dollars and cents can be got in proportion to its cost, is the cheapest, and we are confident that it gets more than a hundred dollars' worth of work every time he gets one of these.

These remarks are made after a familiarity with the merits of most of the good Plows in use in the West, many of which have justly earned a good reputation

☞ Our new model "B" Plow is designed expressly for stubble and foul ground, heretofore we have had only the "C" pattern designed for both, turf and stubble. The "B" and "C" patterns together will enable us to meet the views of all as to shape, and give them either "bold" or "clean" plows as they prefer

These Bitters are prepared, in pure Bourbon Whiskey, from a combination of over twenty different kinds of roots, barks and herbs, which act in perfect concert one with other, prepared from the original formula given by the great chief, Red Jacket, to Dr Chapin, who used them successfully in his practice for many years, and by their use gained so great a popularity in the treatment and cure of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Constipation, Sick and Nervous Headache, Fever and Ague, and all diseases arising from torpid liver or indigestion. B. J. BIDWELL,

Died

In this village on the 2d of Nov. of Typhoid Fever, SARAH, wife of Wm. Nixon, aged 48 yrs. 3 months and 15 days.

☞ The weather for the past week has been delightful: Our Indian summer is rapidly passing away. December is almost at hand.

☞ On the 21 inst a Lodge of Good Templars was instituted in Ridgeway Lenawee Co. Mich by Rev. D. C. Wright Deputy Grand Chief of the State.

Married.

At the residence of the brides father, in Cambridge on Tuesday Nov. 7th, by Rev. Mr. Lyster, MR. JOHN D. HOLMES of Manchester, and MISS NANCY KEENEY of Cambridge.

☞ On the 7th inst. Christopher Barrett Sen. of Ridgeway was thrown from his horse while riding to pasture, and two of his ribs broken, with other injuries involving doubtful results.

☞ On the 8th inst, Christopher Shayler, of Macon, was found dead in his stable, apparently caused by the kick of one of his horses, upon his chin. His family were at the time, waiting for him to come to dinner, and found him soon after the accident occurred.

☞ The Livery stable property south of Hayden's Warehouse, formerly owned by Underwood, has changed hands and is now owned by Charles Bidwell. Mr. Bidwell was formerly a resident of Macon and has served two years in the army. He is now prepared to furnish the best "rigs" at the cheapest rates.

☞ "There's a happy time coming."—"Mine host" George Whiting of Moreville, has recently been enlarging and reparing his Hotel at that place. The addition made to his dancing hall makes it one of the best in the State. He proposes to dedicate it by a grand Cotillon party on the eve. of the 24th inst.

George is a good fellow and we bespeak for those who attend a gay time.

Soldiers Monument.

Whereas, we were called upon as a nation, to pour out Blood and Treasure to put down the most wicked Rebellion the world ever saw, and in order to express our gratitude and admiration for our citizen soldiery who fell in defence of our nation's honor; a society has been organized called the Tecumseh, Macon, Ridgeway and Raisin soldiers Monument Association for the purpose of erecting and maintaining a suitable Monment on Military Square, in the villagge of Tecumseh, in perpetuation of their memory.

Therefore we the undersigned hereby severally agree to pay to the soliciting committee or their order when called upon, the sum set opposite our respective names, towards the erection and maintenance of said Monument:

Oh, Buckwheat Cakes!

The gentlemanly proprietor of the Raisin Mills, has presented us with a sack of the nicest Buckwheat flour we ever saw. It fairly makes our mouth water to look at the sack that contains it. He says that Alf. James keeps a supply of it constantly on hand and we advise all those in search of a good article to call there and get some. The Raisin Mill is now in the best of repair and is daily turning out the best of flour. Friday has been set apart as day for grinding Buckwheat.

Great Gift Enterprise.

In order to keep pace with these days of progress and reform, C. H, Adam & Co propose hereafter, with each bill of goods to the amount of $5 and over, to present a gift of from 25cts. to $25 in value. They have just received a large and splendid assortment of Fall and Winter Goods, which they are selling at the lowest cash prices. They invite special attention to their stock of Ladies Vests and Pants, cloth for Cloaks, with Ornaments, Buttons, Trimmings &c.; also Lined and Furred Gloves & Mitts, Gauntlets, Gaiters, Hose, Scarfs, &c. They are recieving almost every week, new supplies of all the latest and best styles of goods from New York, Toledo, Detroit and Chicago. Ladies will find a lady salesman for articles of ladies wear.

☞ Go to Ward & Strickland's for the cheapest coats, pants and vests in the county.

Public Lectures.

Will you permit me, through the columns of your paper, to call attention to a matter which should secure attention.

The young people of our village have organized the "Tecumseh Union Lyceum," holding its regular meetings at the Union School on Monday evenings.

Believing that education is not obtained wholly within school or college walls, but is promoted by interchange of ideas and contact of mind with mind everywhere, they propose to secure public lectures to be delivered before the Lyceum during the coming winter The privilege of listening to, and profiting by, the thoughts and sayings of the wisest men, can only be secured in this way. Our people are feasted with Concerts and glutted with "shows" of every character; but really profitable amusements, those that will not only amuse but instruct and leave lasting and valuable impressions upon the mind—are very rare among us.—The corresponding Sec. of the Lyceum is in communication with such men as Hon J. M. Gregory of Kalamazoo, former State Superintendent of public instruction, Dr E. O. Haven of our University, Hon. E. B. Fairfield of Hillsdale, who are expected to lecture before the Lyceum during the winter.

To secure these advantages involves some expense; but the young men confidently hope that the intelligent people of Tecumseh and vicinity will, by their liberal patronage of lectures, both aid and encourage them in their undertaking. The people of Tecumseh are intelligent enough to appreciate, and should be wise and liberal enough to support, public amusements of an elevated and instructive character.

It is now expected that Hon. J. M. Gregory will lecture before the society on the evening of Friday, Dec. 1st Further notice will be given.

Shipments from Tecumseh.

Through the kindness of Mr. J. C Satterthwaite, the Railroad Agent at this station, we lay before our renders the amount of the shipments for the month of October. They speak well for the business energy and prosperity of Tecumseh.

Apples—7050 barrels,
Flour—5000 "
Sorghum Molasses—4 bbls.
Shingles—83,000.
Broom handles—450.
Live Hogs—30,000 lbs.
Cider—100 bbls.
Wool—12,965 lbs.
Leather—8022 lbs.
Butter and Cheese—6.636 lbs.
Oats—10,218 lbs.
Staves—20,000.
Heading—30 bbls.

The above are the principal articles that have been exported. The total shipments during the month amounted in the aggregate to 2,497.194 lbs. The imports amounted to 538,257 lbs. The total amount of produce & merchandse handled over at the Depot foots up at the respectable figures of 3,025 451 lbs, or allowing one ton to a wagon load, it amounts to over 1517 wagon loads. The apples shipped from this station up to Nov. 13th were 12040 bbls, and there are enough more awaiting shipment to amount to 12,200 bbls. in all.

Bursting of a Mill stone

One day last week an accident occurred at the Globe Mills by the bursting of a Mill stone. The hands had all gone to dinner except Mr. Thomas Baylis the chief Miller, who had just returned from his.—Upon raising the gate to set the Mill running he found that but one run of stone had been geared on, consequently he went immediately to the wheel to let down the gate, and while bending over to shut the gate, the stone that was in motion burst with a loud crash, several pieces went through the Mill. One stone weighing about 60 lbs. passed a few inches over Mr. Baylis' head and another larger piece just grazed his left shoulder. Had he been standing up, he would have been killed without any doubt. It was very lucky also that none of the other hands were in the Mill. The stone that bursted had been in use for several years and the iron bands around it were rusted almost entirely through—which was probably the cause of the accident. The damages were soon repaired and the mill is again in running order.

Proclamation by the President.

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God, during the year which is now coming to an end, to relieve our beloved country from the fearful scourge of civil war, and to permit us to secure the blessings of peace, unity and harmony, with a great enlargement of civil liberty; and

WHEREAS, Our Heavenly Father has also, during the year, graciously averted from us the calamities of foreign wars, pestilence and famine, while our granaries are full of the fruits of an abundant season; and

WHEREAS, Righteousness exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people:

Now, therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby recommend to the people thereof that they do set apart and observe the first Thursday of December next as a day of national thanksgiving to the Creator of the Universe for these deliverances and blessings; and I do further recommend that, on that occasion, the people make confession of our national sins against His infinite goodness, and, with one heart and one mind, implore the Divine guidance in the ways of national virtue and holiness.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 28th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1865, and of the independence of the United States the 90th.

(Signed) ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President: WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK.

James Brooks' seat in Congress is to be contested by his competitor, Wm. E. Dodge.

Advices from Mexico state that the citizens of Matamoras are in a starving condition, and the Imperial troops are but little better off.

Wirz's body was buried on Saturday at the arsenal at Washington, near the remains of the assassination conspirators. It has come to light since the execution, that Wirz's wife, in an interview with her husband on the 27th ultimo, kissed him, and in so doing, conveyed to his mouth a little ball of strychnine coated with licorice. General Baker, who was present on the occasion, suspecting that something was wrong, siezed Wirz by the throat, and compelled him to disgorge the poison. Mr. Schade (Wirz's counsel) pronounces this statement an infamous lie.

The Ohio and Mississippi railroad company, has commenced a suit against the Indianapolis railroad company, claiming damages to the amount of over $1,500,000, for the breaking by the latter of the contract existing between the two roads, whereby the latter used the track of the former from Cincinnati to Lawrenceburg, Indiana.

The last of the stolen funds, $8,000 of the late express robbery in Chicago, have been found under a church.

Worth has been elected Governor of North Carolina over Holden, by from 5,000 to 10,000 majority.

Steps are to be taken by the Canadian Government to meet the anticipated danger of a Fenian invasion. A large body of troops, estimated at 18,000, is to be stationed along the frontier.

In the South Carolina legislature, bills have been reported for the seizure of all arms found in the possession of freedmen, to punish white persons who shall furnish arms to freedmen, to shut up all shops kept by freedmen, and to prohibit the employment of any negro without the written consent of his or her former master having been first obtained.

Turner is elected to Congress in the Raleigh district of North Carolina, and Clark in the new district. The former was a member of the rebel congress, and the latter can not take the congressional oath.

A WHOLE FAMILY BURNED TO DEATH IN STEELE COUNTY.—A family by the name of Clark, living near Crain creek, in this county, were burned to death by the explosion of kerosene oil on Sunday night last, in the following shocking manner:

Having occasion to fill a lamp, Mr. Clark undertook to do so without extinguishing the blaze. The oil in the lamp took fire and exploded, communicating the fire to the can, which also exploded, enveloping him in flames. He ran out of doors and and rolled himself in the grass; but before he could succeed in extinguishing the fire, he was burned to a crisp. His wife was sitting near the door, holding a sick child, but, when the explosion took place, fell to the floor, and, before they could be rescued, both mother and child were burned to ashes.

Dr. Ware was called to the unfortunate man, but he could render him no assistance, and he died in about an hour.

A family living in the upper part of the house saved their lives by jumping out of the window. The mother had her hands and arms badly burned while searching for a burned bed, supposing one of her children to be still there, but finding the father had succeeded in getting them all out of the window, she threw herself out head foremost, fortunately receiving no injuries, except dislocating one wrist. The house and its contents were entirely consumed.—Owatonna Minn. Plaindealer, 13th.

SIMEON JENNINGS, of Wellsville, Ohio, died suddenly, while sitting in his chair, last week. He possessed enormous wealth, mostly in the shape of real estate and mortgages on the same. He also owned large interests in a number of Ohio banks. He was noted for his extreme penuriousness and intense devotion to money-getting. Though worth millions, when traveling in the cars he would carry a lunch in his pocket to save the expense of a dinner at an eating-house. He bought a plain brick residence below Wellsville, on the Virginia side of the Ohio river, and made that his home, to escape paying taxes in Ohio on his mortgages, judgment notes and money. He always managed somehow to avoid paying a large share of the taxes justly due from him. The heavy federal income tax nearly broke his heart. He was very obese and gross looking, and for several years drank whiskey in large quantities. He was probably the richest man in Ohio. He leaves no direct issue—dying childless. He has several collateral heirs, however, but leaves property enough to bestow a large fortune on each of them. We have not heard that he left any bequests to benevolent objects.

HOTEL-LIVING IN NEW YORK.—The proprietors of the Broadway hotels are talking seriously of raising their prices of board from $4.50 to $6.00 per day, not because they have grown immensely wealthy at the former figure, but because they believe they can obtain the latter rate as easily; and I believe they can. As it is, the landlords are unable to accommodate the crowds of applicants for board, and they are inclined to establish a tariff out of pure benevolence to their guests of course, that will give their customers more room. The prices which some persons pay at the fashionable hotels are remarkable. There are families at the Fifth Avenue who give $500 to $600 a week for their mere lodging and boarding privileges, while their "extras" will reach $300 to $400 more.—New York Letter.

THE TIN WEDDING.

A few weeks ago, Mr. Tilton of Brooklyn, N. Y., had what is called a tin wedding, that is, a celebration of the tenth anniversary of his married life. Among the guests was Miss Phœbe Cary, who presented the following poem:

Dear friends, the thought must surely come
To night to every thinker,
That he who joined your fates at first,
Was something of a TIN-ker.

For through the ups and downs of life,
Though fair and stormy weather,
His soldering for TIN long years,
Has held you fast together.

And since your love has worn so well,
Another truth we settle,
You are not made of TIN-sel stuff,
But true and tempered metal.

And therefore, may the gods on you
Their choicest gifts bestowing,
Fill up the TIN cups of your lives
With bliss to overflowing.

May love and friendship smooth the path
Of life your feet are treading,
Till happier than your nights of TIN
Shall be your golden wedding.

And may you hear with hearts as young
Our last congratulations,
As when your marriage bells first rung
Their tin-tin-nabulations.

She then started for home about half a mile distant, running and uttering the most fearful cries Her husband heard her and met her at the door, and took her in his arms to carry her to the house, when his fingers penetrated to the bone, so dreadfully was she burned. In the fall the oil became ignited, and the flames flashed along the car with fearful rapidity endangering the lives of several lady passengers, but who escaped as by a miracle. He never repeated a sermon. Mr. Turrell was a native of Boston.

HERE is a pleasant and authentic anecdote of the late J. F. Herring, the animal painter. A dozen years ago he painted a small picture for one of our best known dealers, and received a check in payment. The check was written on a slip of paper, "Pay Mr. J. F. Herring," and duly signed, but without the insertion of the words, "bearer" or "to order," and the clerk of the Union Bank looked very doubtful, first at it, and then at the person presenting it. The artist noticed this and demanded what was wrong. The clerk explained. "Don't you see it is payable to J. F. Herring." "I do," said the clerk. "Well, I am he." "How do I know that?" said the clerk. "Do you know what J. F. Herring is?" "Rather," said the clerk; "I've got the 'Three Members of the Temperance Society' at home." Herring was delighted. He seized a pen, and on a sheet of blotting-paper lying on the counter, dashed off a sketch of some horses' heads. "What do you think of that?" said he, handing it across. The clerk paid him at once.

—We learn that the services of Dr. Lieber as professor in Columbia college, New York, have been transferred to the law school, and that the chairs of history and political economy which this distinguished philosopher has hitherto filled, have been abolished in the college proper. How that institution is to be got on without instructing its students in ithese branches, is a queston. We trust that this change is not to be taken as a part of a system to be introduced by the new southern president of that venerable seat of learning.

THE largest of New York editors in point of size, is James Gordon Bennett, while the smallest is Henry J. Raymond. Both of these men have been bold editors, and yet, quite strangely, the latter has never met the touch of personal violence, while the former has been punished often and severely. Mr. Raymond exhibits a marvellous contrast between muscle and intellect, His industry for a quarter of a century past, has been incredible, and, he has the reputation of being the hardest worker in New York. In this way, he has built up The Times.

Erastus Brooks of The Express, is of a tall nervous frame, indicating no ordinary degree of power, and yet, with all his ability, he has failed to build up a leading paper.

As for Horace Greeley, almost everybody knows how he looks, and we need only add that he dresses much better than in former days, and the famous white coat has retired from service. We believe that the eccentricities of this peculiar man are entirely unaffected, and are only the idiosyncracies of his nature. Mr. Greeley has changed but little in twenty years, and wears remarkably well considering the great amount of work he turns off daily. When we first saw Mr. Greeley, he was a tall, slender youth, with a peculiar freshness of countenance, and a beautiful simplicity playing over his features. This was in 1889, when he was struggling for a foothold in the great metropolis. He has since become stouter, and while he shows the marks of time, he has not put off the early marks of his character.

His chief opponent, Thurlow Weed, is six feet high and well proportioned, albeit we do not admire his style of countenance. We are glad that these two gentlemen are now united in the support of the party to which they belong.

We have thus referred to the veterans of the daily press, and we may remark that during a period of twenty years or more, they have stood at their post of daily toil with uniform industry, and in each individual case, have gained in weight since the commencement. Not one has died during the term mentioned.

Among the editorial corps of New York, the public interest singles out one as an object of chief curiosity. This is Bennett. There is, perhaps, some excuse to be found for this in the fact that no public man has ever said so much about himself as he. He has even advertised his own personal ugliness, and that too, in the most indelicate manner. We might quote from his own personal columns, such references ad nauseam but we forbear. Mr. Bennett is seldom seen, and while other editors are open to the public, his method for years has been seclusion. We think the habit grew out of a sense of danger, arising from the bitterness of his personal attacks, and the frequent retaliations which followed. Mr. Bennett is understood to make no claim upon public sympathy; he warred upon society, and expects to receive whatever may come. If wealth be the great end in life, he has succeeded, since his establishment is estimated at two millions; but we doubt if this affords the expected satisfaction. In early days, Mr. Beenett was tall slender, and exceedingly awkward. He has since become very stout, and is the largest, stoutest and richest of New York editors. He is descended from an old Scotch Roman Catholic family, was educated for the priesthood, and though a life-long scoffer at sacred things, still clings to his early faith. Of the religious preferences of the other editorial gentlemen referred to, we may add that Mr. Greeley is a Universalist, and Mr. Raymond a Presbyterian. Of the religious press, Mr. Prime of the Observer is a large, well built man, with quiet, unostentatious manners. This corres-

Execution of Wirz.

Special Despatch to the Chicago Tribune.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 10.

The execution of Henry Wirz attracted crowds of people to the Old Capitol this morning. At nine o'clock, a strong military force arrived, and the streets in front, and at the sides of the building were cleared. Owners of tenements, from the windows or roof of which views of the gallows could be obtained, admitted spectators at large prices, and quite a number of women availed themselves of this opportunity to gratify their curiosity.

Holders of tickets were admitted into the prison, through which they passed into the yard. A rough gallows had been erected in one corner of the yard, on the platform of which stood four sentries of the veteran reserve corps, while from the beam dangled the fatal rope, which should prove a deadline to the tyrant of Andersonville. Wirz was in his cell, attended by Fathers Boyle and Wiggett of the Roman Catholic Church. Last night he ate a hearty supper, and then went to sleep at 10 o'clock reposing quietly, until he awoke about three o'clock this morning. He then wrote his farewell to his wife, and made some statements about his connection with the rebellion, asserting that he had maltreated prisoners, in accordance with orders from his superior officers, but solemnly protesting that he had never killed any one, or perpetrated the cruel acts ascribed to him. After the sentence was read to him in prison, Wirz said; "I'm d—d if the Yankee eagle hasn't turned out to be just what I expected—a damned turkey buzzard."

HE ASKS FOR PRIESTS.

He then asked that the Rev. Father Boyle be sent for, and also Mr. Schade, his counsel; and since that time, these gentlemen have been almost constantly in attendance on him. Besides these, some ladies have called, one of them paying her last visit to him yesterday, when she brought him some delicacies. As she was was leaving, he manfested emotion when he expressed his gratitude to her, and remarked to Mr. Schade who was present, that that was the last tear he would shed in this life.

A couple of ladies said to be of the family of a prominent officer, called on him also and in reply to a question as to whether he had hope, he said: "Certainly madan; the greatest sinner has hope; and I being innocent must surely have hope." To-day he received a dated Cadiz, Ky., in which she used the most affectionate language, and expressed a hope that they then were seeing their darkesh hour. She urges him to cheer up and be prepared for the worst; but is satisfied that if the government knew how much anguish they had suffered, he would not be condemned to death. She also states that she intends with her children to go to his people in Europe.

LETTER FROM HIS WIFE,

WIRZ HAS BEEN AN INFIDEL,

but of late professed repentance, and one of his religious advisers assured me that he believes that he was sincere, and that he truly repented. Just before the hour appointed for the execution, a young Massachusetts official of the prison, handed him an autograp album, in which he wrote with a clear steady hand, "Old Capitol Prison, Nov. 10, 1865. Henry Wirz, Captain and A. A. G., C. S. A." "There," said he, "is my last signature."

At half past nine the

PREPARATIONS FOR EXECUTION

were made. Wirz was attired in a long robe or shroud of black cambric, and an attempt was made to handcuff his wrists, but his right arm was so wasted that the iron could not be fastened without giving pain. "I don't want to be cross," said he, "but don't hurt me. The irons were removed.

LEAVES THE CELL.

When smumoned to leave the cell, Wirz remarked to Father Boyle, "I hope this black dress will soon be turned into a white robe. I go willingly."

Meanwhile some 200 spectators had congregated in the prison yard, about 30 of whom were representatives of the press. Many of the others were young officers, some of whom had experienced the cruelties and insults of the rebel prisons.

In the distance the dome of the capitol towered up through the leaffess branches of the trees, and on every vantage ground near by were spectators—many of them soldiers—a few of them women.

ARRIVES AT THE GALLOWS.

At a quarter past ten, the hum of conversation subsided into a profound silence as Maj. Russell came from the prison, followed by the criminal, who was escorted by his spirtual advisers. He was a much taller man than I had expected to see, and walked with a firm step, glancing up at the sky, as if refreshed by the sunlight; his long, black hair was combed smoothly down, his head showing a high forehead. His beard and whiskers were full; almost conceaing the expression of his face, and his cunning eyes twinkled with a defiant expression of apparent indifference. On reaching the gallows, he ascended the steps with alacrity, and seated himself in a chair placed on the drop. Father Boyle, from the hour he had received the sadrament, stood at his right hand, holding in his hand a small crucifix, and at his left hand stood Father Wiggett.

CHARGES AND SPECIFICATIONS.

Major Russell read in a clear voice the long charges and specifications, in which the name of Jeff. Davis is included. Wirz listened to the tedious document with attention, nodding his head in assent when some portions of it were read, and shaking his head negatively at other portions. Father Boyle would occasionally present the crucifix to him as if to strengthen him for the coming struggle by the hope of divine forgiveness. Occasionally the impatient crowd would give hideous yells, upon which the criminal would betray uneasiness. Then Father Boyle would display the symbol of redemption saying, "Faith, hope, charity—repentance will save you." At the last reading of the charges, the specifications, the finding of the court, and the President's approval of the sentence, had all been read, Major Russell turned to the prisoner, and asked if he had any remarks to make. He replied in an unconcerned tone that he had no wish to say anything to the public. To the Major he would say he died innocent. He had but once to die. His hope was in the future.

Major Russell then shook hands with him receiving his thanks for courteous treatment. The priests bade him farewell with words of consolation, and retired. He stood erect upon the drop; the hangman pinioned his arms and feet, adjusted the noose and put on the black cap. Then commenced

THE DROP FELL.

Henry Wirz with a sudden plunge was hanged by the neck till he was dead, dead, dead. May God have mercy upon his soul. It was seven minutes after the drop fell before the convulsive motion of the body ceased, and subsequent surgical examination shows that the neck was not broken.

Boiler Explosions.

The many catastrophes of the present season from the explosion of boilers have set intelligent men to thinking. Norman Wiard, the ice boat man propounds a new theory, which may or may not account for some mysterious explosions:

In cases of violent explosions, in which the rupture is not in the weakest parts, the riveted joints, but often in the strongest parts of the solid plates, he holds that the cause of rupture is difference of temperature, which causes the plates to strain themselves. Water does not transmit heat downward; therefore it may happen that when part of the fire surface is not covered with water, the steam may be heated red hot, and heat all that part of the boiler which is above the water level. Only a thin film of water will be hot, while the iron below the water may be of the temperature of the water, under 300° while all above may be hot enough to burn the felting, perhaps 700 or more. The hot portion expands in length and strains against the cooler portion; and this strain is much greater than the strain of the steam, and added to the strain of the steam, causes the explosion. There are instances very numerous, in which cast-iron has been ruptured by differences of temperature alone; and even wrought iron forged in large masses, such as shafts, is internally split in cooling, as appears from cutting through it. And when in a boiler, the difference of temperature is such that the upper part of a cylindrical shell, would be half an inch longer than the lower part if they were cut apart, the strain has the same effect as if a strip of the plate along the water level were of a weak quality.

The force with which parts of the boiler are projected, is accounted for by the power known to exist in hot water, acting expansively, as powder acts, but less violently. If a rupture occur, which suddenly liberates this power, the water and iron will be projected with the force usual in explosions.

There was great excitement in the New York stock market last Monday, a "corner" being established in Prairie du Chien,—60,000 shares having been sold short, while only 29,000 were issued. At the first board the price jumped from 150 to 220. The price dropped at the second board, to 165, but rallied, after the board, to 210. The extremes of the day were 120 and 230. A "cornering" movement was also started in Cleveland and Pittsburg, the sales at the morning board reaching 18,000 shares. Petroleum stocks were likewise excited, the sales of Pithole Creek exceeded 20,000 shares.

DURING the ensuing year, it is probable that an important line of railway, connecting New York with St. Paul, Minn., will be near completion. This is to be accomplished by the connection of the Minnesota Central with the McGregor Western at Austin, near the state line of Iowa. Both of these roads are progressing rapidly to the point of junction, and when united, will form via the Chicago and Northwestern and Milwaukee and Prairie du Chien, a continuous railroad route to St. Paul.

The Northern Central Railroad Company, (Baltimore to Harrisburg) are laying a second track, rebuilding bridges, and putting the road-bed in smooth working order. The improvement is to be completed in a few months.

The Russian-American Telegraph expedition explorers have sounded Behring's Straits, and reached the Asiatic side.

INTERESTING SIGHT.—Isn't it funny to see a lady with both hands in soft dough, and a musquito on the end of her nose?

A FEW RAW.—A "creature" being asked by a lady, the other evening, if he loved oysters, replied, "My dear madam, my love for oysters amounts to a few raw" (furore.)

PROPOSED CHANGE OF NAME.—Mexico, from her past entangled government, might have been properly called Mixico, but it's would-be Emperor proposes to change its name to Maxico. At present, we think it should be called Muxico.

NEW USE FOR A POSTOFFICE. — The following advertisement appears in a late number of the Syracuse Courier: "Manure—wanted, stable manure. Any person having from five to fifty loads to dispose of, will please send word or drop it through the postoffice."

NOT AS A "FELLER."—A young lady in the "rural districts," was once escorted home from an evening party by a young man to whom she was not particularly partial. On taking his leave he remarked: "I guess I'll come and see you next Saturday night." "Well, Bill Smith," replied the lady, "you can come as a friend, but not as a feller." Bill didn't go either way.

CAUSE FOR FRIGHT.—A loafer who had been noisy, was up before the Mayor's court. His Honor told him to pay over five dollars for his fine.

"C-o-o-can't do it" muttered he; "a-a-ain't got the pewt-r."

"Are you a married man?" inquired the Mayor.

"Not exactly so f-f-f-far gone yet sir."

"Well, I will have to send you to the workhouse"

"Tain't nuthin' to g-g-go there," said Alick, "but when you t-t-talked about m-m-marriage, old fellow you f-f-frightened me!"

RAILROAD WAGGERY.—Waggs went to the depot of one of our railroads the other evening, and finding the best car full, said in a loud tone:

"This car isn't going!"

Of course these words caused a general stampede, and Waggs took the best seat. The cars soon moved off. In the midst of indignation, Waggs was questioned—

"You said this car wasn't going!"

"Well, it wasn't then; it is now."

The "sold" laughed a little, but Waggs came near getting a good thrashing.

MONS. FROGGY TO MISS KETO.—Small-billed poetry has abounded latterly. It is to be hoped the following closes the season:

Petite moskeetare, your time it have come!
Ze frost he have call for you—go you now home.
All of your bux ze-bux into my ear—
Now I am rid of it;

From the Western Railroad Gazette:

"Indian Summer."

BY E. M. HALE, M. D.

Autumn has put her garb of beauty on,
And sinks into delicious reverie,
Dreaming of sunny hours and spring days gone,
Gone like the waves of a receding sea;
And over hill and dale, and wood and lawn,
Are strewn the trophies of her riper days;
And until evening's hour from morning's dawn,
O'er all doth rest a dim and dreamy haze.
All sights and sounds seem softened by its power
And all is calm and still as holy Sabbath hour.

Each varied scene is hushed in semi-sleep,
With misty drapery around it thrown;
And wearied nature is in mood to reap
A drowsy rest in quiet all her own.
The roving winds their silent vigils keep,
Moving on noiseless and slow wand'ring wings
On hilly ranges, smoky columns creep
Or on some craggy steep like mantle clings;
Or on some sylvan lake it softly lies
As oft a dimness comes and rests on tearful eyes

The golden sun rides in the mild blue sky,
His fiercer rays no longer earth oppress;
But gazing down with soft and languid eye,
He vieweth all below with gentleness.
The fleecy clouds go slowly sailing by,
Like mighty ships upon a waveless sea,
Or like strange things of life they grandly fly
On wings that move all slow and solemnly;
Or oft upon the far horizon lie,
Masses on masses piled, like mountains proudly high.

The spreading fields no more are clad in green,
Save where the upspringing wheat bedecks the plain;
The bending reapers now no more are seen,
Amid the golden sea of waving grain,
While in their path the busy hands did glean.
But there are furrowed fields of dusky brown,
With barren grounds of stubble spread between,
And gray earth on the hill-sides sloping down
From hoary heights to hedges far beneath,
That round the hill's brow cling, as clings a warrior's wreath.

With glories all unknown to other lands,
The forest now with varied robe is clad;
Their margins round, the downy hazel stands;
By wood and stream bends the dark willow sad,
With sumach interspersed like flaming brands.
The yellow hickory and purple oak
Round which the ivy climbs in crimson bands,
Are towering high, and oft the lightning's stroke
Has fallen on them in a stormy hour,
Yet bravely have they oft withstood its crushing power.

In lonely marsh, or on the craggy steep,
Unchanging stands the solemn evergreen;
And where the river's tide flows dark and deep,
The sycamore with spotted bark is seen—
The waters woo the boughs that o'er them lean,
Laving their drooping branches till they weep.
And with bright, quivering leaves, the poplar high—
Through which with rustlings soft the winds do creep—
Stands by the stately elm that storms defy,
While on its boughs the lark, high rocking sleeps.
And there the chestnut vast with leaves of brown,
From whose expanding burs the nuts come rattling down.

High in the sky, the hawk majestic sails—
The wild duck floats upon the shaded lake;
And oft is heard the whirring flight of quails,
As swift they rise from out the reedy brake.
From gray barns comes the muffled sound of flails,
Like partridge drumming on the woody hills;
And from the river's side in sleeping vales,
Comes the dull rumble of the drowsy mills;
While the bright waterfalls, with mimic roar,
Lull the tired kine that rest upon the streamlet's shore.

And when fair night her soft, dim mantle flings
Upon the earth, and from the radiant sky,
Bright, starry eyes look down on lowly things,
While the pale moon is calmly mounting high;
Then is the time that a sweet influence brings
Loved ones together in some quiet spot;
And while the chirping cricket to them sings,
They talk of a pure love that changes not;
Nor think they, in their truth and beauty yet,
That cherished hopes of youth, like moon and stars, do set!

Thine, "Indian Summer," are the dearest hours
That come to us within the changing year.
Brighter than when the dreary winter lowers
O'er the bleak earth that shivers, cold with fear;
Fairer than spring or summer with its flowers,
Or autumn, with its wealth of fruit and grain;
For, as the moonlight falls on shattered towers,
Falls thy soft light upon the heart's domain;
Bringing a sacred joy—a peace most rare,
And by its soothing power, dispelling shades of care.

CLOSE QUARTERS.

A RAILROAD ADVENTURE.

A fine spring evening and I was in the very midst of the steaming, reeking heart of London. Dust in the roads, dust on the paving stones, crowds thronging the causeway, carts and carriages rolling one after another, the noise of their wheels deafening my ears, the sight of the multitude oppressing my vision. I am one who would fain gaze on green meadows and waving weeds; I will be off into the country. Such was the tenor of my thoughts as I closed the door of my house, situated in Oxford street, and made my way for the depot. I soon reached Euston Square, and made for the huge station, whose large hall I entered, and amused myself, as I had some time to wait, in watching the various passengers as they arrived and departed. After speculating on several whose appearance attracted me, I caught myself gazing with some degree of interest at a young man who appeared to have nothing of more importance to occupy him than I had myself. He was tall and dark, his forehead was high, and his eagle eyes gave indications of an active spirit within, as they flashed with anger when one of the porters let a heavy parcel fall upon his foot. "Careless rascal!" he exclaimed, "you have almost crushed my foot!" The man apologised, and the stranger remarked: "It seems as though if a person has a tender place these fellows are sure to find it out!" I sympathised with the gentleman, and we soon entered into conversation on my observing that I was going by the nine o'clock train; he told me that he, too, was going by the same, and we arranged to travel together.

"How far are you going?" he asked.

"Only as far as Rugby to-night, and then I shall ramble slowly off towards the North," I answered.

On looking to the compartments, we saw the usual number of somnolent, disagreeable passengers one mostly meets on an English railroad.

"How is it that people will persistently try, or pretend to try, to sleep in the cars?" remarked my new acquaintance, "where no one ever really could sleep. It is only a miserable pretext, dislocating one's bones, and reminding belated travelers of the comfortable beds they ought to be in at home."

"Yes," I rejoined, as we entered the carriage, "and how everybody looks at you on entering, as though you had no right there, and were most likely a pickpocket!"

"And people ought to be very careful who they travel with, young man," said a hoarse voice in the farthest corner of the carriage.

I looked and saw a little fat man, tightly buttoned to the chin in a large white great coat, and with a comforter up to his ears.

"You may smile," continued he, "but I could tell you a thing which occurred to me on this very line, and by this very train, that would open your eyes a little."

"By all means let us hear it, sir!" exclaimed my dark companion. "The train is just starting; we have forty-two miles' run before we stop again, and are only three in the carriage. If you will tell your story, I will tell you one, and perhaps our friend here will do the same."

I expressed my willingness to have done so had I any adventure to tell, but added: "I have some cigars, and if you will both accept one we will endeavor to pass a pleasant hour."

The short man took the proffered weed and commenced his story, as follows:

It may be four years ago, and it may be five, that I was called by business from my home at Yarmouth to London. It was about a law suit, and as there was plenty of money and the costs likely to come out of the estate, we witnesses we pretty well treated by the lawyers; at least they treated me well enough, and dropped me a sovereign over and above the usual fees. Well, the case being over early in the day, I determined to go and see some sights, enjoy myself, and return by this same train. I arrived at the station pretty early, for having enjoyed myself, I was in good humor and thought how I should like to have some jolly companion with a cigar to join me on the line down. I walked up and down the platform, but there were few passengers that night, and I could see none I liked. Well, I got my little friend refilled (here he tapped the region where reposed a bottle case), and stepped into a second-class car. I found I was alone, and said, "Hallo, Jim, this is not the sort of company you bargained for; however, you are not the sort of boy to meet sorrow half way." Remarking this I took a seat, a porter shut the door, and the train was about to start when there was a hurried stamp on the platform and a man jumped in. The door was shut, and before I had time to see what my companion was like, the train had started and was in full career. He appeared to be a figure of the largest, if I were to judge by the height and size. His head was covered by a slouched hat, the brim of which was turned down in such a way as to conceal his face. Not liking his appearance, I sat quiet in a corner.

"You don't seem very sociable, neighbor," he began; "come, be sociable."

I replied that "I had no objection if I only knew how."

"Well," he replied, "first take a pull at this," drawing out a huge bottle, "and then we will have a game of cards."

I answered that I was a teetotaler, and never played cards.

"Now don't tell me none of your lies," he said. "Not drink, eh?" and he accompanied his words with a dig in my right side, on my bottle case.

The blow was gigantic; the force of that man's hand you can not imagine; my bottle was broken in bits, and the liquor running out discolored my coat.

"A teetotaler, eh?" said he; "this smells wonderfully like rum. Now, I tell you what, my cove," says he, pulling out a pistol, "sit down at once (for I had started to my feet), or I will leave one alive in this carriage, and I promise it shan't be you." He held his pistol close to my head, and I was forced to obey.

"Now I tell you what, I am quiet and peaceable, but you shall be sociable, and play, and drink—come."

He handed me the bottle and I pretended to drink.

"Now," said he, bringing forward the cards, "what shall we play? You don't know, eh—well, we will play hookey. I will be banker; I will put four packs down; you put money down on three; I will double it, and if the one comes up uncovered highest, I win; if not, you. Of course you won't stake anything low."

I protested I had no money, but he spoke in such a feeling way of the trouble I should cause him to search me for my purse, that at last I pulled it out; it contained about thirty pounds. I covered the packs and of course I lost at once; in a few minutes all my money was gone.

"Now, let me see, your watch, chain and rings are worth twenty pounds—just stake them," said he, with awful emphasis. I did so, and they were gone.

"Well," he said, "your clothes are good,—we will play for them. Of course, as a gentleman you will redeem them in money, won't you? Say five pounds you stake, I cover—won again, never was such luck. Well, I don't know, you seem a shabby critter; I'd best have them while I can;" and seizing me he deliberately stripped me of all my clothes, one by one. I struggled and screamed, but it was no good. He stripped me to my very stockings. I begged, I prayed for a rag to cover me, for the night was cold.

"You may think yourself well off alive," he said. Never mind, I gladly thought, the train slacken speed. Wolverton is here. Alas! as I spoke, the wretch stepped into the darkness, and before I, a naked, wretched man, could make the people at the station understand what had happened, he had gone beyond recall.

All I ever recovered was my white great coat, which the villain had dropped in his flight.

A Boy Better-ing.

A writer in All the Year Round, thus philosophizes:

"I wonder sometimes if they can possibly be the same genus as the boys with whom I associated when I myself was a boy. I paid a visit lately to a gentleman in the country, and in going over the house to see its lions, I was shown into a room where my host's boys printed a weekly newspaper for their own amusement! There were all the appliances of a printing office; cases, galleys, rules, imposing stones and presses; and two young gentlemen whose united ages probably did not amount to five and twenty, were so far familiar with their use as to be able unaided to compose and print a weekly newspaper, containing news and articles of their own writing. I thought of my playroom, and what it contained. I had a vision of a penny top; a pop-gun roughly made from the branch of an alder tree; a kite composed of a half-penny cane and a sheet of brown paper; a worsted ball wound upon an old barrel bung; and a teetotum. Again, the other evening I went to a party and I had scarcely entered the house when my host's two boys carried me off to the garden to take my photograph. One, quite a little fellow, posed me in a chair, instructed me to look at a certain spot, and warned me of that principle of the convex lens which has a tendency to enlarge feet and hands which are placed too much in advance of the rest of the body. The other boy, meanwhile, was in a dark room, playing with subtle chemicals of whose nature and properties, his grandfather, the eminent chemist had never dreamed. In less than five minutes, these two youngsters had used one of the closest secrets of nature to fix my image on a piece of glass. It was as easy a feat to them as it was for me lift up my top while spinning, in a spoon, or in the hollow of my hand * * * When I was a boy, my library consisted of some half a dozen sixpenny books, such as Jack the Giant Killer, Puss in Boots, the History of Cock Robin, and an abridgement of the Arabian Nights. I remember that I kept them locked up in a deal box and was exceedingly chary of lending them, or even of letting any one look at them. But boys now-a-days take in their weekly and monthly magazines; correspond with the editors; answer riddles and rebuses; contribute puzzles and engage in chess tournaments by correspondence; nay, they club subscriptions to Mudie's and read all the sensation novels as they appear. I see some square-capped boys of not more than fourteen years, going to school every morning reading their penny newspapers. I have no doubt that they read the law and police reports under their desks when they ought to be getting their lessons. Boys and hobbledehoys used to be a nuisance because they were lumpy, and awkward and uninteresting; and because they were too young to share in the conversation of grown people. But now-a-days, if boys are voted a nuisance at all—which they will not tamely permit, it is because they are too clever by half—they know a great deal too much."

Daring Robbery—The Money Recoverd

About nine o'clock Thursday morning, the 9th inst., one of the most extensive and daring robberies ever committed in Chicago was perpetrated on Clark street, on the corner of Lake street, the particulars of which are substantially as follows:

At the usual hour in the forenoon the wagons of the American Express Company received their loads of valuables at the office of the company, on the corner of Lake and Dearborn streets, and then proceeded as usual to deliver them to their proper owners in diffent parts of the city. One of the wagons was a light, covered vehicle, open at both ends, drawn by a single horse, and freighted with numerous packages for various banking institutions and individuals—among these packages were four canvas carpet bags, containing greenbacks and two small boxes filled with specie—the entire money contents of the wagon amounting to between two hundred and fifty and three hundred thousand dollars. The wagon was in charge of a driver and deliverer, (L. T. Prout and George Matthews) the special duty of the former being to drive the wagon and of the latter to deliver, and look after the packages consigned to his hands for disposal.

After delivering a number of packages, the wagon drove to the Traders' Bank, No. 44 Clark street, where Mr. Matthews alighted and entered the institution for the purpose of delivering a package, leaving the driver on the seat, in charge of the wagon and its contents. The First National Bank, situated on the corner, being the next place of delivery, Mr. Prout drove the wagon up in front of it, and awaited there the return of Matthews. He had not been there many minutes before Mr. Castle, one of the Company's messengers, came across from the opposite corner, and asked him how many deliverers there were with that wagon. Prout answered that Matthews and himself were the only persons in charge of the wagon. Castle then asked him if the packages were all right. Turning, Prout glanced over the contents of the wagon, and exclaimed to his companion, "My God! one of the bags is gone!"

The alarm was at once given, and while Mr. Matthews remained in the wagon, Prout looked high and low for the valuable parcel, but it was nowhere to be seen. Mr. Castle, upon being questioned, stated that in passing along Clark street he had seen a tall man walk up behind the wagon and take therefrom a carpet bag, but supposing him to be one of the deliverers, did not pay particular attention to his appearance, or the quality or description of his dress. He saw the man passing along Clark street, until he came to the Sherman House, when he lost sight of him in the crowd.

The most insane and exaggerated reports as to the amount of the loss were circulated through the streets. These reports were false of course as will be seen by the following note from Mr. Fargo, Superintendent of the American Express Company:

OFFICE OF THE AMERICAN EXPRESS CO., CHICAGO NOV. 9, 1865.

EDITOR TRIBUNE: The amount of money stolen from our wagon this morning will not exceed $40,000, * * * * * and consignees have been requested to present their claims for payment.

Yours, &c., J. C. FARGO

Immediately after the robbery was committed, the matter was given into the hands of Superintendent Turtle, who forthwith set the whole detective machinery at work, and to officers Kenny & Webb was given a share in the work. Suspecting the driver (Prout) to be implicated in the matter, they attempted to bring him to a confession, but nothing could be got out of him. It was soon discovered that he had a brother by the name of William, living in the West Division, and officers Webb and Kenny next turned their attention to him. Shortly after dark they hid themselves near the house (situated on Brown street, one door South of Taylor,) and for two hours waited in the utmost suspense. About 9 o'clock a light appeared in the front room, and on the officers stealthily creeping up to the window and peering in through the blinds, they perceived Wm. Prout and a young woman actively engaged in counting huge piles of greenbacks laid out before them on a table. This, to the officers, was positive assurance that the right birds were caged, and they bided their time. About half an hour later a man drove up to the house in a hack, entered and soon emerged again in company with the one previously seen counting the money. They entered the hack and were about to drive off when the detectives pounced upon them.

Having secured their prisoners, attention was directed to the house itself. The building from the outside presents a very uninviting appearance, being in a dingy and dilapidated condition; but on entering, a scene of almost oriental magnificence met their astonished gaze. The walls were hung with large mirrors and costly pictures, the furniture was of the best quality, and a magnificent carpet covered the floor. The only inmate was the female before mentioned—a beautiful girl, about seventeen years of age, by the name of Rosa Le Craig—who had been acting as "Moll" for the men in their expeditions. The officers, seeing a large trunk in the room, demanded the key, but she pretended to know nothing about it. The men then began to tear up the carpet, and on coming to the spot where she stood when first accosted, the key was found imbedded in the carpet. The officers now opened the trunk, and at the bottom, under a lot of old dresses, they found a lady's traveling bag, which on opening was found to contain part of the missing money. The rest was discovered tied up in an old handkerchief. On searching the bed, the identical carpet bag which contained the money at the time it was stolen, was found stowed away between two mattrasses. A rigid investigation of the premises disclosed a secret closet behind the front door, and in this recess were found several full sets of burglars' tools, also a lot of powder, fuses and other paraphernalia resorted to in destroying safes. After the investigation of the premises had been completed, the parties were placed in the hack and taken to then Central Station.

A PLAY UPON NAMES.—A Southern paper remarks that "the following General invitation from a Confederate country maiden to a friend in the city was penned before the Confederacy 'went up:'"

Come leave the noisy Longstreet
And come to the Feltts with me;
Trip over the Helb with flying feet
And skip along the Lee.
There Ewell find the flowers that be
Along the Stonewall still,
And pluck the buds of flowering pea,
That grow on A. P. Hill.
Across the Rhodes the Forrest boughs
A stately Archiecay form,
Where sadly pipes that Early bird
That never caught the worm.
Come hasten, for the Bee is gone
And Wheat lies on the plains;
Come braid a Garland ere the leaves
Fall in the "blasting Rains."*

* Rains will be recollected as the partner of McDaniel in the torpedo business.

MR. WEBSTER visited Mr. Adams a short time before his death, and found him reclining on a sofa, evidently in feeble health. He remarked to Mr. Adams:

"I am glad to see you, sir, and I hope you are getting along pretty well."

Mr. A. replied in the following figurative language:

"Ah, sir, quite the contrary. I find I am a poor tenant, occupying a house much shattered by time. It sways and trembles with every wind, and what is worse, sir, the landlord, as near as I can find out, don't intend to make any repairs."

Swine are held by many in high esteem as food, but their hind parts are all gammon.

Alliterative Acrostics.

One of the best specimens of alliteration, on an extended scale, is the famous poetical account of the Siege of Belgrade. The author is unknown. Belgrade was often besieged and taken—eleven times between the years of 441 (when Huns captured it) and 1789 (when it was taken by Laudohn). The siege commemorated by the poet probably was the last, when the famous fortress fell. (There is alliteration again).

THE SIEGE OF BELGRADE.

An Austrian army, awfully arrayed,
Boldly by battery besieged Belgrade.
Cossack commanders cannonading come,
Dealing destruction's devastating doom.
Every endeavor engineers essay
For fame, for fortune, fighting, furious fray.
Gaunt gunners grapple, giving gash as good,
Heaves high his head, heroic hardihood.
Ibraham, Islam, Ismael—imps in ills—
Jostle John Jarvolitz, Jem, Joe, Jack, Jill.
Kick kindling Kutukoff, kings' kinsmen kill,
Labor low levels loftiest, longest lives; (lines!)
Man march 'mid mounds, 'mid moles, 'mid murderous mines.
Now nightfall's near, now needful nature nods,
Opposed, opposing, overcoming odds.
Poor peasants, partly purchased, partly pressed,
Quite quaking, "Quarter! quarter!" quickly quest.
Reason returns, recalls redundant rage,
Saves sinking soldiers, softens seigniors sage.
Truce, Turkey, truce! truce, treacherous Tartar train,
Unjust, unwise, unmerciful Ukraine,
Vanish, vile vengeance! vanish, victory vain!
Wisdom wails war, wails warring words. What were Xerxes, Xantippe, Ximenes, Xavier?
Yet yany's youth, ye yield your youthful yest,
Zealously, zanies, zealously, zeal's zest.

This is the text, as given in Henry Southgate's "Many Thoughts on Many Things," and adopted by Chambers. But there are variæ lectiones, in another copy, supplied by a literary friend in Philadelphia, which—especially the closing lines—are worthy of being recorded for comparison. Here are the different readings:

Generals 'gainst generals grapple, gracious God!
How honors Heaven heroic hardihood!
Infuriate, indiscriminate in ill,
Kindred kill kinsmen, kinsmen kindred kill.
* * * * * * *
Now, noisy noxious numbers notice naught
Of outward obstacles opposing aught—
Poor patriots!
* * * * * * *
Reason returns; religious right redounds;
Suwarrow stops such sanguinary sounds,
True to thee, Turkey! Triumph to thy train.
* * * * * * * * *
Why wish we warfare? Wherefore welcome were Xerxes, Ximenes, Xanthes, Xavier?
Yield, yield ye, youths! Ye yeomen, yield your yell!
Zeno's, Zarpater's Zoroaster's zeal
Attracting all, arms against acts appeal.
* * * * * * * * *

We throw the various readings down before curious scholars—a hard nut for them to crack! Which is the accurate version?

A correspondent sends us another specimen, about which he writes thus:

"It is, perhaps, literally, the most accurate alphabetical acrostic that has appeared. Without at all entering into competition with the wonderfully spirited 'Siege of Belgrade' on the score of expressive force, it would be easy to point out several particulars in which it has an accuracy over that admirable composition. None of the peculiar difficulties of the task are shirked—the lines follow the exact order of the alphabet. No one without a trial would conceive the difficulty of finishing in a fair Alexandrine on the letter Z, which becomes, in its place, the most intractable of all.

"There is no rhyme, that I am aware of, between the words beginning with Y and Z; this may cause the illegitimate 'zealed' to pass muster, while a similar reason may excuse the manufacture of the bobtail 'unwont.'"

We now subjoin the alliterative acrostic sent us by our correspondent. It certainly is a spirited and surprisingly-correct specimen:

PRINCE CHARLES PROTECTED BY FLORA M'DONALD.

All ardent acts affright an age abased
By brutal brofls, by braggart bravery braced.
Craft's cankered courage changed Culloden's cry;
"Deal deep," deposed! "deal death!" — "decoy!" "defy!"
Enough. Ere envy enters England's eyes,
Fancy's false future fades, for Fortune flies.
Gaunt, gloomy, guarded, grappling giant griefs,
Here, hunted hard, his harrassed heart he heaves;
In implous ire incessant ills invests,
Judging Jove's jealous judgment, jaundiced jests!
Kneel, kirtled knight! keep keene kingcraft known,
Let larger lore life's leveling lessons loan;
Marauders must meet malefactors' meeds;
No nation noisy nonconformists needs.
Oracles of old! our orb ordain
Peace's possession—Plenty's palmy plain!
Quiet, Quixotic quests; quell quarreling;
Rebuke red riot's resonant rifle-ring.
Slumber seems strangely sweet since silence smote
The threatening thunders throbbing through their throat.
Usurper! under uniform unwont
Vail valor's vaguest venture—vainest vaunt.
Well wot we which were wise. War's wildfire won
Ximenes, Xerxes, Xavier, Xenophon:
Yet you, ye yearling youth, your young years yield
Zuinglius' zealot zest—Zinzindorf's Zion-sealed.

Still, we think it deficient in the spirit which characterizes the "Siege of Belgrade."

The Yosemite Valley—A Magnificent Work of Nature.

Correspondence of the New York Tribune.

See Yosemite and die! I shall not attempt to describe it; the theme is too large and my capacity too small. Beside, after three months' rapid travel among the grandest features of the continent, I am sated with sight-seeing, have lost the keen edge of relish and run out of adjectives. Yosemite should be studied for months; I have see it but five days. Volumes ought to be and will be written about it; in two letters I can only group a few hints and impressions.

Yosemite—signifying grizzly bear—was the name of a tribe of Indians. In 1851 they were hostile; the whites, pursuing them into their home and stronghold, discovered this crowning wonder of the world. Finding in one lodge a very aged squaw, they asked how old she was. The Indians replied that when she was a girl these mountains were hills! To appreciate the statement one should see the mountains.

Our party of 17—the largest which ever entered the valley—includes my companions of the overland trip, Fred McCrellish, of the Alta California Frederic Law Olmstead, the well-known author, architect of Central park and secretary of the United States Sanitary commission. On Monday, after four days' hard travel from San Francisco, we galloped forward out of the pine woods, dismounted, stood upon the rocky precipice of Inspiration Point, and looked down into the garden, or rather as he would view the interior of some stupendous roofless cathedral from the top of one of its towering walls. In the distance were snow-streaked mountains. Right under us was the narrow winding basin of meadow, grove and shining river, shut in by granite walls from 2,000 to 5,000 feet high—walls with immense turrets of bare rock—walls so upright and perfect that an expert cragsman can climb out of the valley only at three or four points.

Flinging a pebble from the rock upon which we stood, and looking over the brink, I saw it fall more than half a mile before striking. Glancing diagonally across the narrow, profound chasm, I surveyed an unbroken, seamless wall of granite two-thirds of a mile high, and more than perpendicular, the top protruding over the base. Turning toward the upper end of the valley, I beheld a half dome of rock one mile high, and on its summit a solitary, gigantic cedar, appearing like a mere twig. Originally a vast granite mountain, it was riven from top to bottom by some ancient convulsion, which cleft asunder the everlasting hills and rent the great globe itself.

The measureless, inclosing walls, with these leading towers and many other turrets, gray, brown, and white rock, darkly veined from summit to base with streaks and ribbons of falling water, hills, almost upright, yet studded with tenacious cedars, and the deep-down level floor of grass, with its thread of river and pigmy trees, all burst upon me at once. Nature had lifted her curtain to reveal the vast and infinite. It elicited no adjectives, no exclamations. With bewildering sense of divine power and human littleness, I could only gaze in silence till the view strained my brain and pained my eyes, compelling me to turn away and rest from its oppressive magnitude.

Women in the Departments.

A Racy Letter from Mrs. Swisshelm.

The Washington Chronicle publishes a sensible, racy letter from Mrs. Jane G. Swisshelm, on the duties of women in the public department, which is so applicable to them and also to the sterner sex, in all relations of life, that we transfer it to our colums. After stating her claims to be heard on the grounds that she led the advance on the woman's rights question, at a time when it was unpopular to do so, she says:

The employment of women in the Government Departments is an experiment. It has not, thus far, been so complete a success as its friends could wish, and may possibly yet be pronounced a failure. The fault is chiefly all on our side of the house. Women persevere in carrying the drawing-room to the office. Unless this mistake can be corrected, the experiment must fail.

A fixed rule of good breeding excludes the shop from the parlor. A man who lugs his business, habitually, into his social hours is always a bore; and what should we think of one who went to his counting or consulting room in the ball-dress of the previous evening?

During business hours men require to be released from the restraints of the drawing-room—not certainly from the rules of good manners or good morals, but from the etiquette of society. In the social circle it is all right; they should pay all due attention to their "natural enemies," who continue to present them with the old apple of disobedience; but to ask them to keep up a state of chronic admiration for taper waists, glossy ringlets, bewitching smiles, and all the et ceteras, is a strain upon human endurance which must snap the cord.

In business hours men must "mind their own business," or the world's work will be left undone; and if the presence of women among them disturbs the even flow of thought, the women must and should get out of the way.

It is painfully humiliating to any lover of the race to see American women of education holding important places in the grandest Government the world ever saw, and imitating the costume and manners of the Parisian grisettes. Let any thinker watch the troops of women stump, stump, stumping, or rather thump, thump, thumping up and down the long, stone stairways of our different departments, with their feet crushed into shoes so tight that all elasticity of step is gone, and the foot comes down like an old-fashioned stick leg, while the shoe, which, if large enough, would last easily six months, must burst in one; let him or her look at the spreading hoop and flashily festooned and ornamented skirts which invite attention to these poor crushed and crippled feet; let him or her note the jaunty hats and "cunning" feathers; the poor hair stuffed with "rats" and "mice" and bundles of buffalo hide, which make one sick with disgust, and then bedizened with buds and spangles enough to satisfy the vanity of a brace of Chippewa squaws, and let him say what these women are, externally, but bad imitations of the genuine grisette? It would certainly be better for humanity that all this class of Government employes should starve at home than they should corrupt public morals, and we lower the national standard of womanly delicacy by recognizing their right to fill the honorable positions many of them occupy.

Stolen Sugar.

Katy kept wishing, and wishing and wishing for a lump of sugar; and there was the closet wide open, with the sugar-tub in plain sight. Her mother was very busy moulding bread in the great red kneading-bowl, and she would be sure to say, "No my child, not now," if she asked her; at least, Katy thought she would. But instead of running away, and trying to forget all about it, she kept on thinking and thinking how sweet the sugar would taste, and how much she wished for just a little lump.

"I've got the hiccoughs too, and sugar will stop them; so I ought to have some," she said to herself, shaking her curly head and trying hard to hiccough, but only getting out a funny little grunt. So you see the evil spirit which was urging Katy on to steal, had now put a little lie into her heart. Oh, it would have been so much better if she had turned away then to chase the hens ont of the pea-vines, or ran to pluck a handful of butter-cups without stems—that was Katy's way of making a boquet—or anything to take her out of sight of the sugar-tub.

But no; she went nearer and nearer the open door, as a little bird hops up closer to the charmer snake, which is making ready to devour it. By-and-by she slipped into the closet. The lid was not quite on; for her mother had just been to the tub to get some sugar for pies. So the little girl pushed the lid easily to one side, and picked up a big lump in a hurry, never stopping to think that God could see in the closet, though she was behind the door. Then she walked right through the kitchen, and out on the stoop to eat it.

And where do you think she carried the sugar? She clasped it tight in her dimpled fingers, and to hide it, held her hands behind her. So when she turned to go out of the room, there were dimples and sugar and all in plain sight of Mamma and Amy and Aunt Salome.

Wasn't she a silly little thing not to know better than that? Not sillier than other people either; for this is usually about the way when we do wrong and try to hide it.

Besides that God can see always, in every place, our stolen sugar is also quite apt to be in full view of everybody but ourself, although we may be ever so sly, and fancy we are ever so secret; and you may be assured that is a great deal better to do nothing we are ashamed of and afraid to have known.—Child at Home.

A Use for Useless Things.

It is often the case that worn-out articles lie about the premises for years without being of any use whatever, but which one dislikes to destroy. We occasionally see a good deal of ingenuity displayed in converting these to some valuable purpose.

Around gristmills may frequently be seen the worn-out stones that have been there for years. We saw a man take one of these and place it where he wanted to set a cedar post. He set the post in the centre of the stone, and it forms a permanent foundation, and renders the post less likely to be moved by frost. Split in twain, they make good door-steps.

Steel hoops, which are always under foot, may be used for tying up grape vines. Some have recommended their use for trailing vines; but nobody would like the looks of them there.

A wooden chair, minus its legs, nailed on to a block, makes a capital milking stool. It can be turned down without being wet or soiled.

Old barrel-hoops, which often get more kicks than blessings, make good trellis for tomatoes, by nailing two of them to a stake a foot apart on each side of the plant.

Paint kegs are excellent for keeping soft soap in small quantities.

A good sized barn door truck, screwed to the end of a heavy gate, will save a good deal of lifting, and render it capable of being opened and shut by a child. We have seen a wooden truck answer a good purpose.

Thus every farmer who reads this article can add to its value by suggesting some use for some other useless things.—Ohio Farmer.

BARNUM'S expressed design of exhibiting Tom Thumb in France, has called forth a good witticism from Ledru Rollin. "Tom Thumb should exhibit Barnum," said he; "for the latter is the greatest curiosity."

Go to the Best.

Bryant & Stratton's system of Actual Business Practice, as caried out in the Chicago College, is the most extensive and complete exposition of Theory and Business combined, of anything that has heretofore been devised and put in practice. In a few months by this system, a young man is changed from an ordinary student, laborer or clerk, to an accomplished business man, having the ability to transact, manage, record and talk about business affairs as he could not otherwise do without years of experience. We understand that there are some seven hundred students now in attendance at this college, and every department is in capital running order. Young men going to Chicago, should visit this college before making other arrangements, as it is the best introduction to business that one can have. For further information, address Bryant & Stratton, Chicago, Ill.

FOR the benefit of our music-loving friends we clip the following from the Chicago Evening Journal: — At the late Indiana State Fair, the committee of awards paid a deserving tribute to LIGHTE & Co.'s PIANOS, pronouncing them unequaled in action, elasticity of touch and power of tone, leaving nothing to be desired. It is needless to say that their competition was great, reflecting the more credit on the competitors. This magnificent piano, entered by W. W. KIMBALL, of Crosby's Opera House, was the great center of attraction. There were many pianos there from some of the most celebrated manufacturers, but this reigned supreme. It has deservingly received the FIRST PREMIUM.

Mr. Kimball also carried the palm on that occasion, for S. W. SMITH'S AMERICAN ORGAN, and a patent piano stool, which he is manufactuaing and furnishing at half the usual cost.

AWFUL.—The following startling threat was made use of the other day by an excited pugilist: "I'll twist you round your own head, and ram you down your own throat, until there is nothing left of you but the extreme ends of your shirt collar sticking out of your eyes. His opponent left.

LORD PALMERSTON used to tell this anecdote of himself: "When I was a young man the Duke of Wellington made an appointment with me at half past seven in the morning, and some one asked me, 'why Palmerston, how will you keep this engagement?' 'Why,' I said, 'of course the easiest thing in the world. I'll keep it the last thing before I go to bed.'

The Science of Health!

Every Man his own Physician.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS, AND HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

Disorders of the stomach, Liver & Bowels.

The Stomach is the great centre which influences the health or the disease of the system—Abused or debilitated by excess indigestion, offensive breath and physical prostration are the natural consequences. Allied to the brain, it is the source of headaches, mental depression nervous complaints and unrefreshing sleep. The liver becomes affected and generates bilious disorders pains in the side &c. The bowels sympathize by costiveness, Diarrhoea and Dysentry. The principal action of these Pills is on the stomach, and the liver, lungs, bowels and kidneys participate in their recuperative and regenerative operation.

Erysipelas and Salt Rheum.

Are two of the most common and virulent disorders prevalent on this continent, to these the Ointment is especially antagonistic its "modus operandi" is first to eradicate the venom and then complete the cure.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Uncers.

Cases of many years' standing, that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions on the Skin.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic diseases, are eradicated and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Female Complaints.

Whether in the young or old, married or single, at the dawn of Womanhood, or the turn of life, these tonic medicines display so decided an influence that a marked improvement is soon preceptible in the health of the patient. Being a purely vegetable preparation, they are safe and reliable remedy for all classes of famales in every condition of health and station of life.

Piles and Fistula

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emolient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healing qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills should be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Mercurial Eruptions.	Swelled Glands
Sprains,	Burns,	Piles,
Sore Legs,	Stiff Joints,	Chapped Hands
Tetter,	Rheumatism,	Sore Breasts,
Chilblains,	Ringworm,	Sore Heads,

Wounds of all kinds,

CAUTION—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway New York and London," are discernable as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

Probate Notice.

STATE OF MICHIGAN,—County of Lenawee, ss.—At a session of the Probate Court, for the County of Lenawee, holden at the Probate Office, in the City of Adrian, on Monday, the 28d day of October in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty five.

These Bitters are prepared in pure Bourbon Whiskey, from a combination of over twenty different kinds of roots, barks and herbs, which act in perfect concert one with other, prepared from the original formula given by the great chief, Red Jacket, to Dr. Upham, who used them successfully in his practice for many years, and by their use gained so great a popularity in the treatment and cure of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Constipation, Sick and Nervous Headache, Fever and Ague, and all diseases arising from torpid liver or indigestion. Persons suffering from either of these loathsome diseases will find a sure cure by the use of these Bitters, which are perfectly pure and free from all those drugs and poisons usually put up in such preparations and palmed off on an unsuspecting public. A single trial will convince the most skeptical that in the RED JACKET there is virtue which no other Bitters possess.

They strengthen and invigorate the system.
They are unequaled for general debility.
They are a sure cure for dyspepsia.
They give a good and healthy appetite.
They assist digestion.
They are the best stimulant in existence.
They are a preventive of Fever and Ague.
They relieve constipation.
They cure Nervous Headache.
They are perfectly pure and palatable

Aged persons and delicate females will find they can save large doctor's bills by the use of these Bitters.

Beware of counterfeits. The Red Jacket Bitters, are only sold in bottles with our name blown on the side, and our private government stamp across the cork.

—OUR—

For Medicinal and Table uses, which are perfectly pure, and used only be tried to be appreciated. None genuine unless they have our gold label on each bottle, and our initials pressed in wax over the cork.

Telegraph Line,

We know of nothing more needed than a Telegraph Line to Adrian. Jackson is cut off from all telegraph facilities with the towns on the Southern road as far as Adrian which is a great disadvantage. A line to that place is greatly needed by our business men, and would be of much convenience.—What say the towns on the route to the project of building the line on their own hook, if it is not of enough importance to the railroad to induce the company to build it? We feel sure Jackson would do its part.—Jackson Citizen.

The towns on the line of the Jackson Branch can fully sympathize with the Citizen on the telegraph question, for its necessity is sadly felt. The want of a line is a terrible nuisance at times. But we should like to have our enterprising cotemporary suggest some line of action. We have had so many telegraphic projects here that have fizzled that our business men are getting discouraged. If our understanding of the matter be correct the Western Union has control of the right away on the railroad for a line from Adrian to Jackson and we do not know why the line is not built. A Mr. Almy, from New York was through here last fall for the purpose of organizing an independent company, but gave it up upon finding that the Western Union controlled the route. The Western Union is playing a regular dog in the manger game. It will neither build the line itself nor allow any one else to build it. This question should be thoroughly ventilated, and we thank the Citizen for its timely suggestion.

THE TROUBLED HEART.

O'er the troubled heart,
As on the troubled waters,
Rise dark tides of grief
And linger on the borders.

Washing all the shells,
And pearls away before them,
Leaving naught but sands,
With faded joys strewn o'r them.

Search along the coast.
See wasted pleasures lying,
Look far in the depths,
Where withered hopes are dying.

Rescue! that pure heart,
Gather up its treasures,
Dive! and fetch the pearls,
Find for it new pleasures.

Bind it with "loves tendrils,"
Dress its wounds with care,
Take it to your bosom,
All its troubles share

Friend, it is your mission
In this world of sorrow,
To whisper to the stricken heart
Hopes of a "bright to morrow."

Benefit Concert,

The Concerts given last week for the benefit of the Soldiers Monument Association passed off very finely, although we are sorry to say they were not supported as generously as they should. Perhaps however, the effort to put on airs was one cause of the slim attendance on the first evening. The Concerts consisted of glees, choruses Anthems, quartetts &c., and were both grave and humorous in their character. The chorus singing was particularly fine and the quartetts were well executed—especially when we consider the fact that many of the performers appeared in public for the first time at these Concerts. We heard an old musician in the audience remark that he had never heard a chorus of forty voices enunciate their words more distinctly than Prof Leland's class. Every syllable could be distinctly heard. No higher complement could be paid to any ones singing for distinction of enunciation is one of the chief—if not the chief excellency of vocal music. Prof. L. designs continuing his lessons another term.

☞ A correspondent writing to the Jakson Citizen from this place, says:

There is one hour each day when we have a stir—it is when the mail comes in from the South. Our Postoffice is then as lively as it was in war times. It is painfully crowded, and what seems very strange, the crowders for the males are the ladies!—What they can all be expecting, is a mystery: Business men must stand back, or stay out of doors, till some scores of young girls and boys are allowed to step up and ask "is there anything for Mehitabel Jane Seroggs," or "Thomas Jefferson Nincom" They generally have no boxes, and some of them could hardly read their letters, should they get one. Newspapers are never seen in their hands, nor do they ever stop at Ketcham's well laden counter to buy one. It suggests the request once put over a Reading Room table, "gentlemen learning to read; will please take the old papers. It should be put up in our P. O. "Boys and girls that have a letter once a year, should wait till the business men are served."

Almost a Fire.

A very mysterious occurrence transpired on Saturday night last in Mr. John S. Walters Brick Store in Mechanics Block. Dr. W. Fisher and Henry Fisher had been sitting up late in their Drug store engaged in looking over some matters pertaining to the new Baptist Church, when Henry stepping to the back door; saw the reflection of a bright light in the rear of the Block and upon going to the back door of Walters building discovered a box on fire in the south room. He immediately burst in the door, and subdued the flames. The box on fire had contained straw and there were several other barrels of straw scattered about the floor all of which had been saturated with Kerosene Oil. The indications are that the fire did not originate accidentally. And yet what object an incendiary could have in burning that property is more than we can see.

Course of Lectures.

We are happy to learn that the Union Lyceum have taken steps to procure a course of lectures here during the coming winter. They propose to have a course of six lectures delivered by eminent men from abroad. A subscription paper has been circulated for the sale of season tickets to secure the pledge of a sufficient amount of means in advance to enable them to complete their design, and with very flattering success.—They will sell season tickets for the whole six lectures for one dollar. Single tickets twenty-five cents. Hon. J. M Gregory will deliver the first lecture of the course on the evening of December 1st, in the new Baptist Church, of which due notice will be given.

A CARD.—Rev. J. Wainwright Ray and Lady beg leave herewith to acknowledge the handsome compliment shown them by the Episcopal Society, and other friends in the visit and Donations, at the Rectory Wednesday afternoon and evening, 15th inst.

The amounts of the donations in cash, were $110 to Mr. Ray $50 to Mrs. Ray and $1.50 to our little daughter. Other presents $41. Total $202 50.

We would also, for ourselves and for the company, thank the leader and members of the Tecumseh Band, for appearing in full strength and fine tune, and discoursing several of their choicest pieces. Their notes were among the most pleasing that were given. May the Band long be famed as "chief musicians on the Instruments,—and may all the donors and visitors realize that "there is that scattereth and yet increaseth."

☞ Dr. Curtis in addition to his former stock has a few set of Ladies Jewelry very nice, also Bracelets, a splendid stock of Photographs and Photograph Albums and a nice lot of Window Shades and Curtain fixtures also Cord and Tassels and almost everything else.

☞ The Indian summer continues, but it cannot last much longer. September weather in the middle of November cannot make a very long stay. Farmers will do well to secure all their late fall crops soon, for we predict that winter will set in with a sudden snap.

Dedication.

The Baptist Church is undergoing the finishing touches, and the Dedication has already been fixed for Thursday Nov. 30th. Rev. J. M. Gregory, President of the Kalamazoo College has been engaged to preach the dedicatory sermon. Mr. Gregory is an eloquent speaker, a close reasoner and a very able man and his effort on that occasion will doubtless be a superior one.

☞ A new lot of Wall Paper and Window Shades just received at J. D. Robbins. Now is the time to buy as there will be an advance soon.

Proclamation by the President.

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God, during the year which is now coming to an end, to relieve our beloved country from the fearful scourge of civil war, and to permit us to secure the blessings of peace, unity and harmony, with a great enlargement of civil liberty; and

WHEREAS, Our Heavenly Father has also, during the year, graciously averted from us the calamities of foreign wars, pestilence and famine, while our granaries are full of the fruits of an abundant season; and

WHEREAS, Righteousness exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people:

Now, therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby recommend to the people thereof that they do set apart and observe the first Thursday of December next as a day of national thanksgiving to the Creator of the Universe for these deliverances and blessings; and I do further recommend that, on that occasion, the people make confession of our national sins against His infinite goodness, and, with one heart and one mind, implore the Divine guidance in the ways of national virtue and holiness.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 28th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1865, and of the independence of the United States the 90th.

(Signed) ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President: WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK.

Ex-President Pierce lies dangerously ill at Concord, New Hampshire.

The reported assault on Mr. Vallandigham at Eaton, O., a few days since, is pronounced untrue.

At Nashville, Tennessee, four men and one woman were killed on Thursday night the 16th.

In San Francisco, Cal., on the night of the 12th instant, two men entered the What Cheer house knocked the clerk senseless, and took $20,000 in gold from the safe.

In St. Louis two men were recently killed in an encounter with highway robbers; and burglaries are of frequent occurrence. On Friday, at noon, a messenger of the United States saving association was knocked down in the street, and a pouch containing $35,000 was wrested from him. A pistol was fired at the robber who dropped the money, and made his escape. The bank of Benoit & Co was robbed of $7,000 in the same way.

The cholera steamer Atlanta has come up to New York city.

Secretary McCulloch is about to fund the compound interest bearing legal tenders into five-twenties at a fixed price.

At Bangor, Maine on Sunday the 12th, the mercury sank to zero, and the smaller rivers in that vicinity were froven over.

The Mississippi Legislature have adopted a memorial praying the President to remove United States troops from that state. The House of Representatives have rejected a proposition to admit negro testimony against the whites.

It is rumored in Washington that Judge Otto, assistant Secretary of the Interior, is about to resign, and that Hon. Jesse O. Norton of Illinois will be announced to fill the vacancy.

As a sample of the manner in which the English treat rebels, it is stated that 1,050 of the Jamaica insurgents have been hanged and shot in the parish of St. Thomas alone. "But don't hang Jeff Davis."

General John A. Logan has been tendered the appointment of Minister to the Republic of Mexico. This appointment was made on the recommendation of General Grant, who in private consultation expressed himself in favor of driving the French from Mexico at the point of the bayonet. The French minister has objected to Gen. Logan's appointment. An answer is daily expected to the intimation sent some time since by Secretary Seward to the Emperor Napoleon, that the presence of French troops in Mexico was regarded with disfavor by our government.

Emerson Etheridge has been acquitted by the Columbus Court Martial. Gen. Thomas has ordered his discharge, but disapproves the findings of the court.

The election in New York is more sweeping than was at first supposed. The Senate stands 27 to 5, last year 21 to 11; the House 94 to 34, last year 76 to 52. The Republicans carry six out of the eight Supreme Court districts.

The census returns of Illinois, now nearly complete, show a gain of 27 per cent. in five years. Should this hold good throughout, Illinois will have a population of 2,163,000.

The Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery, passed both Houses of the South Carolina Legislature.

The Chilian authorities have ordered all Spanish residents into the interior, and are confiscating their property.

Duncan and Winder, the confederates of Wirz in the cruelties in Union prisoners are to be tried immediately.

There was great excitement at Toronto on Wednesday, the 15th, in expectation of an early attack of the Fenians, and troops were placed by the government at the disposal of the mayor.

The Governor of Wisconsin has changed the Thanksgiving Day of that State to that designated by the President, Dec. 7th. Thus far this is the day appointed by all the governors.

The vote on the suffrage question in Wisconsin will run exceedingly close.

Dr. Tyng's church in New York was burned on the 15th inst., involving a loss of about $300,000.

Gov. Wise's personal property has been condemned for confiscation.

The total sick and wounded in Government hospitals at the present time is less than 3,000.

Gen. Baker says there was an error in the published date of the attempt of Mrs. Wirz to poison her husband, but that the facts are substantially as first stated.

Dalton advices report the election of Chas. J. Jenkins as Governor of Georgia, and of Johnson (what Johnson is not stated) as United States Senator.

The President is said to have last week remarked that "he had tried to overwhelm "the South with pardons and kindness; but "from recent events he began to think them "incapable of appreciating magnanimity."

A Richmond paper says that the Southern Congressmen "will stand aloof if the House "is organized without them; and, if the "debate threatens to be protracted and ex-"cited, they will leave the capital and await "at their homes for Congress to send for "them, before they trouble them again."

An application of the American and Russian Overland Telegraph Company, for a naval vessel to assist in laying its cable across Behring's Straits, has been refused by our Navy Department, on the ground that it is a private enterprise.

The siege of Matamoras is still progressing, with every prospect of the capture of the city by the Liberals. While our soldiers on the Rio Grande were cheering the besiegers, an Imperial steamer fired four shot into them.

The through train from New York to Washington ran off the track near Newark, N. J., the 16th inst., killing three persons and injuring several others. Among the injured is Gen. Logan.

The Liberals of Mexico are reported to have captured Monterey, and are still besieging Matamoras. Of the prospects of their success at the latter place advices are conflicting. A large number of additional French troops are reported to have arrived, and the Liberals are reported to have received reinforcements at Matamoras. The Mexican news generally is contradictory, as usual.

The allies are elated over the recent capture of Uruguayana, and now propose to capture the whole of Paraguay, and annex it to the Argentine Republic.

In view of the extortion of Washington landlords, Congressmen are threatening to adjourn to Philadelphia.

The Tennessee Senate has passed a resolution, almost unanimously, adverse to the pardon of Jeff. Davis.

The military in Canada are getting bold and impudent. A company of them has invaded Maine for the purpose of arresting British deserters. The deserters refuse to return, and our Government, which has been applied to to give them up, of course refuses to do so. In anticipation of an outbreak, United States troops have been sent to the scene of trouble.

Preston King, collector of the port of New York, committed suicide by drowning himself on Monday the 11th inst. He appears to have purchased a bag of shot, weighing 25 pounds, and going on board a Brooklyn ferry-boat, to have thrown himself into the river, concealing the shot about his person, in order to prevent floating or rescue. His failing health and strangeness of mind have been noticeable for some time, and he had given faint intimations of some such design. There could have been no official complications to weigh upon him, for besides being of irreproachable character, he had only held the Collectorship for a few weeks. Mr. King served in the lower House of Congress as a Silas Wright democrat from Silas Wright's district. He was the associate of David Wilmot in support of the famous "proviso." Subsequently Mr. King was U. S. senator from New York, his term ending in 1863. Upon the accession of Mr. Johnson to the Presidency, Mr. King was his almost constant companion and intimate adviser, and he was appointed to the collectorship at New York, as a mark no less of personal regard than of eminent fitness. Mr. King was about 60 years of age, and a bachelor.

—The guard at Mr. Lincoln's tomb at Oak Ridge cemetery has been withdrawn.

Incidents and Accidents.

A shocking affair transpired at Muscoda, Wis., last Friday. A lad sixteen years of age, named Charles Dimock, a son of Mr. John H. Dimock, of Chicago, and heir to the principal part of the estate of Asa Dimock, went out to do some chores in the morning, and in about an hour after was found hanging by the neck, dead, in the barn. His feet were touching the floor, and it is supposed he was only experimenting, as he had recenly attended a circus in Chicago, where one of the performers went through the motions of hanging himself, and since then he had talked about it a good deal, and wondered how it would seem. He was a bright intelligent lad, and liked by all who knew him.

The Europe, of Frankfort, gives the details of a horrible crime recently committed at Zajezla, Croatia. The cure of Lemic was sitting at supper, when six brigands forced their way into his house, and whilst three of them guarded the door, the others proceeded to bind all the servants and lock them up in the cellar. They then turned upon the cure and demanded all his money, inflicting divers cruelties upon the old man. They even went so far as to pull out his nails with pincers. They then cut off his fingers and afterwards his hands, and finally decamped, leaving their victim in that horrible state, and carrying off all his ready money, together with his watch and plate, worth about one hundred florins. The cure died the next day of his wounds.

A collision occurred on the Michigan Central Railroad on the 14th, by which three persons were seriously injured.

A child was scalded to death in St. Louis by hot grease; "but," says the reporter, "the parents have two other children."

A fifteen-month-old baby fell from a four story window in Boston, Thursday, and struck unharmed in the yard below.

A man named Riley, in Davenport, Iowa, attempted to commit suicide by shooting himself through the head. The ball entered his forehead and came out at the back of the head, but he was still alive at last accounts.

A man created a sensation in St. Louis last week, by endeavoring to commit suicide in the public street. A bystander, seeing his intention, knocked him down, and a policeman near by took him in custody.

Details of the fatal accident to W. P. Johnson, brother of the President, show that he was accidentally shot while removing a gun from a small boat in which he crossed the Brazos river, on the 24th of October. The ball shattered his arm, and, amputation being deferred too long, he died after lingering three or four weeks. He leaves a wife and three children.

The Springfield Joxrnal is informed that on the 6th instant as the up passenger train on the Chicago, Alton and St. Louis Railroad was in the vicinity of Chatham, one of the lamps in a passenger car fell from its fastenings and burst, throwing the oil over the floor. In the fall the oil became ignited and the flames flashed along the car with fearful rapidity, endangering the lives of several lady passengers, but who escaped as by a miracle. Its informant states that before the flames were extinguished several seats were burned, and, had the car been full, many must have lost their lives before they could have escaped.

—Miss Hetty H. Robinson, the dried-up old maid, whose inheritance already amounts to five millions, has concluded not to further contest the will of her aunt, Lydia Howland of New Bedford; she will therefore take her million from that source and let the other million go for charitable purposes as indicated by the testatrix.

CLEANINGS.

—An Indiana paper says Lafayette has a population of 17,000—not counting a poor devil on Main street who has no soul.

—The Western papers generally comment on the abundance of walnuts, hickory nuts and hazel nuts this fall.

—One result of the New Jersey elections was that a democrat in Washington on Wednesday, was obliged to wheel a Republican from the Capitol to the White House.

—A new thing in New York is the New York City Messenger company. Its men may be seen about the street with scarlet caps bearing the name of that company. Their duty is to go on errands, deliver packages, sweep sidewalks, put in coal, and do other things necessary for the convenience of citizens. The company pledges themselves as responsible for the honesty of the messengers.

—A crusade against advertising in political journals has been started in Paris by M. Arnould Fiemy, in a work entitled Le Revolution du Journalisme. His argument is that advertisements encroach to such a despotical extent upon the space of the journals, as to impair their political usefulness, and their intellectual force and dignity.

—A bashful young lady in Maine says when she gets married, she intends to take chloroform.

—Surveys and estimates have been made for a water-power canal from the Cedar river at Moscow to the Mississippi at Muscatine, a distance of fourteen and one half miles. The fall of water is eighty-four feet affording an immense power, unequalled by anything of the kind in the west. The estimated cost is $750,000, including $231,000 for a tunnel 8,400 feet long.

—The Florence correspondent of the Independence Belge, says that a singular discovery has been made in a church in one of the faubourgs of Milan. A statue of St. Magdalen, which has long been famed for weeping in the presence of unbelievers, was recently moved in order to facilitate repairs on the church. It was found that the statue contained an arrangement for boiling water. The steam passed up into the head and was there condensed. The water thus produced made its way by a couple of pipes to the eyes and trickled down upon the cheeks of the image. So the wonderful miracle was performed.

—A Mr. Whitney of Galesburg Illinois, had a squash vines this year which bore 1,172 pounds of ripe squashes.

—The National Armory at Harper's Ferry is to be rebuilt.

—The entire expense incurred by the government in constructing, equipping and maintaining the war vessels in our navy during the war amounted to less than $230,000,000, the result being that we have a better and stronger navy than any other nation in the world.

—A government detective who had not a cent when the war broke out, has recently put up a hotel in Lansing, Mich., which he rents for $4,760 per month.

—James Townly, a farmer living in Windsor township, Shelby county, Ill., has information from England that his uncle, Lord Townly, died recently, leaving him the snug fortune of $11,000,000. Mr. Townly has "gone for" the money.

—The New York Daily News has the following from its Baltimore correspondent: "While General Joe. Johnston was in Baltimore recently, a young gentleman of the city who had known the General before the war, renewed his acquaintance on the street with the remark: 'General, I regret that we were obliged to surrender to overwhelming numbers, but I rejoice that we are not whipped.' 'You have had no active participation in the fighting, I believe?' inquired the General. 'No sir.' 'Under those circumstances,' rejoined the veteran, 'you are not whipped, but I am!'

—The Boston Advertiser calls editorial attention to a project for "pocketing a church" in that city. It is proposed by the parties to sell a valuable house of worship built by a past generation for pious purposes, and distribute the proceeds, amounting to some $120,000 among about fifty proprietors, and dissolve the corporation. This will give a large profit to some of the owners, who bought their pews for a small sum, some of them, perhaps, with a view to just such a transaction.

—The comptroller of the currency is in favor of removing his bureau from Washington to New York.

—The secretary of the Swiss consulate general at Washington, called upon Captain Wirz, to offer him the services of the official representative of his country in case he wished to present a petition for commutation of his sentence. Wirz declined to avail himself of this offer, on the ground that the Swiss consul general had injured his case by declining to receive contributions for his defense.

—A large number of detectives are now in Washington awaiting the division of the reward offered for the detection and arrest of those engaged in the assassination of President Liucoln. The amount involved is near $250,000, including $100,000 in gold offered in California.

—The vintage in Northern Italy is very abundant this year, and wine will be plenty and cheap. During the last four or five years, the crop has been almost an entire failure, and drunkenness, a vice once almost unknown in Italy, had greatly increased. In the absence of their healthful stimulant, the people took drinking a villainous brandy at first called "little champagne," but now jocosely known as "petroleum."

SMOKING SPIRITUALIZED.

The following unique and beautiful "Meditation on Smoking Tobacco" was written two hundred years ago by the Rev. Ralph Erskine of Scotand. It is like good wine, it improves with age:

PART I.

This Indian weed now withered quite,
Tho' green at noon, cut down at night,
Shows thy decay;
All flesh is hay—
Thus think and smoke tobacco.

The pipe so lily-like and weak,
Does thus thy mortal frame bespeak,
Thou art even such,
Gone with a touch—
Thus think and smoke tobacco.

And when the smoke ascends on high,
Then thou behold'st the vanity
Of worldly stuff,
Gone with a puff—
Thus think and smoke tobacco.

And see'st the ashes cast away,
Then to thyself thou mayest say,
That to the dust
Return thou must—
Thus think and smoke tobacco.

And when the pipe grows foul within,
Think on thy soul defiled with sin,
For then the fire,
It doth require—
Thus think and smoke tobacco.

And see'st the ashes cast away,
Then to thyself thou mayest say,
That to the dust
Return thou must—
Thus think and smoke tobacco.

PART 2.

Was this small plant for thee cut down?
So was the plant of green renown.
Which mercy sends
For nobler ends—
Thus think and smoke tobacco.

Doth juice medicinal proceed
From such a naughty, foreign weed?
Then what's the power
Of Jesse's flower—
Thus think and smoke tobacco.

In vain the unlighted pipe you blow;
Your pains in outward means are so.
Till heavenly fire
The heart inspire—
Thus think and smoke tobacco.

The promise, like the pipe, inlays,
And by the mouth of faith conveys
What virtue flows
From Sharon's rose—
Thus think and smoke tobacco.

The smoke, like burning insence tow'rs;
So should a praying heart of yours,
With ardent cries
Surmount the skies—
Thus think—not smoke tobacco.

A NASHVILLE despatch says that on the 8th inst. Gov. Brownlow had an encounter with a couple of rebel soldiers at Franklin, Tenn. One of them had begged alms of Mrs, Brownlow on the ground of his having fought for the Confederacy. Upon her telling him she could not give him anything for such a reason as that, he grew angry and cursed her. When the Governor learned of the affair he went in search of the offender, whom he found in company with another rebel soldier, who made common cause with him. The Governor whipped them both very genteelly.

PRENTICEANA.

We are greatly influenced by the condition of the weather. When it has been raining for a week, men feel as if they were under a spell—of weather.

Take your cat upon a sea-voyage, if you want sea-mews around you.

Putting a ring in a pig's nose is striking at the root of the thing.

When Adam was the only man upon his mother earth, he was disrespectful enough to give his mother a dig every day.

Those who are most anxious to learn our affairs are generally the persons from whom we should be most anxious to conceal them.

Look well to your daughters; sparks falling upon your house are often less dangerous than those coming into it.

Lovers generally woo their sweethearts in wretched verse, and this is probably the reason why so many of them are properly jilted.

Put your money into a box if you like, but not into a dice-box.

The mischievous winking of a beautiful coquette from under a sweet hood is a very pleasant kind of hood-winking.

Many persons approve no books but such as are representations of their own opinions and passions; they read not to have nature reflected on them and so be taught to know and love everything, but to be reflected themselves as in a pocket-mirror, and to exchange admiring looks with their own narrow cast of countenance.

Many persons have their best society in their own hearts and souls—the purest memories of earth and the sweetest hopes of heaven; their loneliness cannot be called solitude.

Some people are never abreast of the age. They dive into the stream of the past and don't come up again—their heads stick in the mud at the bottom.

A compass is said to have thirty-two points. The compass of some men's minds has no points at all.

Those who have their mouths oftenest open have their minds oftenest shut.

EDWARD EVERETT'S PRECOCITY.—All school boys and girls, and all who ever were such, are familiar with the lines beginning:

"You'd scarce expect one of my age,
To speak in public on the stage."

But all may not know the fact, which we have on good authority, that they were written by Edward Everett; when he was only seven years old. Thus early did his intellectual developements indicate his future greatness. He commenced his public career in the capacity of a preacher, and was settled as pastor of the Brattle street church in Boston at the age of 19.

The Execution of Shakopee and Medicine Bottle.

[From the St. Paul Press, 12th.]

The order for the execution of the two Sioux Indians, Shakopee and Medicine Bottle, reached Fort Snelling on Wednesday in the absence of Col. McLaren, the commandant, and was read to the prisoners by Major Jones, with the aid of Mr. Quinn, a half-breed interpreter. It will be remembered that these two Indians, who were among the most prominent of the instigators of, and actors in the horrible massacre at Red Wood and vicinity in 1862, where five hundred whites fell victims to a treacherous uprising of the savages, were in January, 1864, kidnapped from the British territory north of Pembina, having been dexterously drugged for that purpose, and delivered into the hands of Major Hatch, by whom they were, in due time, conveyed to Fort Snelling. On November 25th, 1864, they were tried before a military court at that place, and convicted of a leading part in the massacre, and in the subsequent hostile movements of the Sioux, and sentenced to be hanged. The sentence was a few weeks ago approved by Gen. Pope, but his order for their execution was suspended upon an appeal by Bishop Grace, to the President, until a re-examination of the testimony upon which the findings and sentence of the court were based should be made by Secretary Harlan, to whom the case was referred.

The execution occurred yesterday at Fort Snelling, and was witnessed by a large concourse of people, variously estimated at from six to eight hundred, including a number of women. The crowd was not nearly so large as it would have been had it been more generally known. The execution took effect in three days after the receipt of the orders, and the consequence was that the news did not get very generally circulated.

Father Ravoux, of the Catholic church, has labored with these poor benighted creatures for several weeks, teaching them the doctrines and ceremonies of his church, and endeavoring to impress upon them the necessity of a full repentance of their sins, and a faith in redeeming grace. He had spent two hours with them in the early part of the morning, administering the Sacrament, and giving them such spiritual advice and consolation as their necessities required. By his indefatigable labors with them he had succeeded in teaching the Lord's Prayer and other forms of prayer, in their own language, which they repeated in a low, monotonous tone. About half-past ten o'clock Father Ravoux knelt with them in prayer for the last time. Medicine Bottle repeated the words which had been taught him, and Shakopee merely assented to the sentiments expressed by a low, mumbling tone of voice and the usual grunt of approbation. These devotional exercises were very impressive.

It was now quarter past eleven o'clock, and Col. McLaren came in to announce that the time had come. Shakopee, who was smoking his pipe, immediately threw the ashes from it, and handing it to the interpreter, told him to give it to the "head soldier," pointing to Col. McLaren. Medicine Bottle, upon receiving the news, arose to his feet, and crossing his hands behind his back, told them to tie him, as he was in a hurry. The guard, under command of Capt. Palmer, of the reserve corps, bound their wrists together, and they marched out, with a firm and steady step, to the place of execution.

They were both dressed exactly alike, each wearing an army suit consisting of light blue pants, dark blue blouse and grey flannel shirt. Shakopee was fifty-four years old and looked even older. His hair was long and straight, and slightly sprinkled with gray. He was considerably bald in the front and top portion of his head, which gave him an apparently expansive forehead, but receding so rapidly as to indicate a deficiency of intellect. Medicine Bottle was a splendid specimen of an Indian. He was thirty-four years of age and of a powerful, muscular frame, indicating great strength and power of endurance. He was a leading warrior among his tribe, and his dauntless courage added to his great physical strength, well fitted him for his position. He also possessed a remarkable memory and an intellect susceptible of a degree of cultivation uncommon to most of his race.

When they reached the platform the orders for the execution were read. The noose was then placed over the head of each and drawn closely around the neck. Even this did not seem to affect them in the least. They stood without the apparent movement of muscle, still maintaining that astonishing firmness exhibited from the first. The white caps were drawn over their faces, and the word being given "all ready," at precisely twelve o'clock the drop fell and all was over. Their necks were both broken by the fall, and Shakopee died without a struggle. A slight contraction of the muscles of the legs could be discovered, but that was all. Medicine Bottle, on the other hand, died very hard. His strong muscular frame clung to life with wonderful tenacity. His writhings were pitiful to behold, and nearly ten minutes had elapsed before his struggles ended.

As soon as the bodies were cut down a great yell went up from the crowd, and such expressions as "how are you, Pennsylvania Quakers," "how are you, Massachusetts philanthropists," and other like exclamations were heard on every side. The crowd also made a rush for the rope, each anxious to have some memento of the memorable scene. The rope, and even portions of the scaffolding were literally cut into fragments. Some relic hunters even took the hats worn by the Indians, as they could not be found after the execution.

THOUGHT IT WAS A CONUNDRUM.—The last effusion of the renowned Artemus, we have not yet seen in print. It is said that A. W. being at one of the New York churches, recently edified the audience by his unexpected reply to the preacher's text, which was "How are the mighty fallen?" "How are the mighty fallen?" After a short pause, Artemus looked up inquiringly, and said meekly, "I give it up."

A Western Want Supplied.

In the West we are pre-eminently a practical people, and our institutions of learning should foster such a tendency. In building up this vast country, we have little time to theorize—we want results brought about as quickly as is compatible with thoroughness. This is more desirable at this time than at any period in our history. The young men who have given the morning of their manhood, in defense of their country, and those who have had to till the soil in their absence, when inclination would have led them otherwise, want to be fitted for actual business life, and that without waste of time.

This want has been supplied by the introduction in Chicago of EASTMAN'S NATIONAL BUSINESS COLLEGE. We have examined his system carefully, and unhesitatingly pronounce it superior to any that has yet come under our notice. His College is emphatically an Actual Business Training House. Every step the business man takes—from entry clerk till he goes on 'Change—is performed by the student, and in his different degrees of advance, he is thoroughly impressed with the minutiæ that have to be mastered by every man who would be a successful merchant.

To facilitate this, the varieties of Dry Goods, Cloths, Grain, Groceries, Etc., marked with their true gold value, are in sample, and regulated by its rise and fall. So every transaction shown on the student's books is performed by the actual transfer of grain sugar, cloths, rice, cotton, scrip, money, stocks, etc., etc. The fluctuations in the prices of these commodities are quoted correctly on the bulletin daily—indeed we may say hourly—and students are thus guided in their sales and purchases.

There is a wholesale department for merchandize in bulk; a retailing department; a bank of issue, with its deposit, discount, and exchange departments; an insurance office, where bona fide policies are issued; a post office where they go through with the regular routine; a telegraph office for despatching messages and receiving telegrams; a board of trade where grain and stocks are bought and sold. In fact nothing about the college is fictitious—the transactions are real. Nor is this all. In the lectures given to the college, the principles of business are most thoroughly elucidated—why a man should be economical in business—why upright in all connections—why hurry off a large stock or hold it—why insure his goods—in short, every why for every act in business life. And when the student has finished his course here, he can step into the exchange, bank, counting-house or store with an experience that some rarely have after the plodding of five or six years, while the student has gained it in the same number of week, or months at most.

We give utterance to an honest conviction when we say that the son of every farmer, mechanic, merchant or professional man, should go through such a training—it matters not what may be his future calling in life, it will give him a practical turn of mind and method. We predict that the wide diffusion of knowledge obtained at such institutions, will do much to lessen the number of the bankrupts in our land, with all their attendant miseries.

After an examination of Eastman's system with all its practical bearing, we can see why it is that such men as General Sherman, Horace Greeley, Mayor Rice, Hon. Mark Wilbur and Geo. W. Bungay, give it such warm commendations.

To make the College complete and better fit those who have been deprived of the advantages of earlier education, Prof. Eastman has provided a preparatory department where Arithmetic, Mathematics and Penmanship are taught. As for Penmanship, we have never seen finer specimens—Prof. Bates' fancy sketches, executed with a steel pen, are beautiful works of art.

Professor Eastman is also fitting up a department designed for the special business training of young ladies—which we view with pleasure, as we deem their present sphere of usefulness altogether too contracted.

We consider Mr. Eastman a public benefactor and heartily wish him success in his enterprise.—Christian Times and Witness.

NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT FOR THE DRAWING ROOM!

THE piano-forte, which has had almost exclusive favor as a drawing-room instrument, is finding a rival in the Cabinet Organ, recently introduced, and which is receiving much favor in musical circles.

An instrument which should be capable, in a good degree, of producing the admirable effects of the large pipe-organ, of adding to them in important respects, and yet, which should not exceed the possibilities of private houses as to space, expense, etc., has long been the desideratum with musical connoisseurs, and its production as object of the ambition of manufacturers. We have become so accustomed to the piano-forte as the able interpreter of all classes of instrumental music in our homes, and it is so admirable in its office in many respects, that it is not realized that, in large classes of music, it labors under great disadvantage from its inability to produce sustained tones. Yet, for the interpretation of many compositions, these are actually essential. From the instant a piano key is struck, the tone rapidly decreases until it is lost entirely. In no way can it be long continued or made to increase instead of diminishing; and the repetition of tones to which the performer is compelled to resort, in place of their prolongation, is, after all, unsatisfactory in its results. The peculiarity of the tones of the piano forte is undoubtedly excellent, as a single effect, conducing to the gracefulness and spirit of its utterances, and its capacity of expression, but it is by no means the only desirable effect, and the impossibility of escaping it produces a certain sameness and monotony, and greatly circumscribes the capabilities of the instrument.

The various orchestral and band instruments, and the human voice, especially, avoid this sameness of the piano forte, and are capable of sustained tones, with greater variety in crescendo and diminuendo effects; but not one of them, singly, can produce harmony as well as melody. Here then, they are far behind the piano in usefulness. Where a number of them can be used together, as in orchestra, choir, or even quartette of voices or instruments, harmony as well as melody, is possible, with every variety of musical effect. Hence it is for such combinations that most of the best musical compositions have been written, and they cannot be adequately rendered by any instrument not capable of sustained tones. But those of us who are less than princes cannot keep at our private command bands of musicians to minister to our musical pleasure at will, and thus the need of some one instrument which shall combine the capabilities of many—which shall add to the capacity of the piano that of the organ, and, under the hands of a single performer, better render our most valuable music than the piano can possibly do, on account of the peculiarities mentioned.

Pipe-organs are out of question, from the large space they must necessarily occupy, in order to contain reasonable compass and variety, as well as from their great cost. In a pipe-organ, if it be properly balanced and well furnished in its lower as well as upper tones, a pipe sixteen feet long and several inches in diameter is requisite to produce the single lowest tone. From this size, the pipes gradually decrease in size as the tones to be produced are higher; but, as in a single full stop there must be sixty-one pipes, and as a reasonably satisfactory pipe-organ must contain several stops, it is obvious that a large amount of space must be occupied by such an instrument—not to mention the expense involved in its construction. For private houses, therefore, to save space and expense, it has been customary and even necessary to omit the heavier stops requiring these large pipes; and so disproportioned, ill-balanced instruments have been the result, without, after all, attaining sufficient compactness and economy to render them generally available.

This insuperable difficulty, with some minor ones, has prevented the pipe-organs from becoming popular as parlor instruments.

For a long time it has appeared probable to those who were cognizant of such matters, that if the desired instrument, which should be a miniature of the great pipe-organ, or an epitome of the orchestra, were ever produced, it must be by the improvement of some form of instrument in which the tones were produced by reeds. These occupy little space, are readily controlled, and do not involve very great expense. Hence much time and ingenuity have been given to experiments in this direction. The chief difficulty to be overcome was not trifling, being nothing less than poor, unattractive quality of tone. The term "reedy tones" had become almost a proverbial expression of condemnation. And then there were other shortcomings scarcely less important.

It is not our purpose to attempt any illusion even to the immediate experiments which have been made in the course of many years to overcome this radical defect, as well as the other deficiencies in reed instruments. Their success has been various, and not always encouraging, though progress was made from time to time, the result of which the public had in the shape of melodeons, harmoniums, and reed organs of various names. It is only within a few years, however, that reed instruments have attained such a degree of excellence as to merit or receive much attention from musical connoisseurs. But within the past few years such material progress has been made by the well-known manufacturers, Messrs. Mason & Hamlin, of Boston, as to place the instruments made by them on a higher level, and to decide the question that the piano forte is no longer to hold the only prominent place as a household instrument.

POEMS UNWRITTEN.

BY MRS. MARY BOOTH.

The following poem, one of the sweetest little gems in the English language, is going the rounds of the press, credited to Alfred Tennyson. It was written by the late Mrs. Mary Booth, wife of the editor of the late Milwaukee Daily Life.

There are poems unwritten and songs unsung,
Sweeter than any that ever were heard—
Poems that wait for an angel tongue,
Songs that but long for a paradise bird.

Poems that ripple through lowliest lives—
Poems unnoted and and hidden away
Down in the soul where the beautiful thrives,
Sweetly as flowers in the airs of May.

Poems that only the angels above us,
Looking down deep into our hearts may behold,
Feel, though unseen by the beings that love us,
Written on lives in letters of gold.

Sing to my soul the sweet song that thou livest!
Read me the poem that never was penned—
The wonderful idyl of life that thou givest,
Fresh from thy spirit, oh, beautiful friend.

Esther Searle's New Year.

BY MISS E. STUART PHELPS.

It is a very simple story that I have to tell you—a little story of a certain New Year's day that went singing its way over the world, laden with its beautiful bright blessings. Of the blessings, there was one more beautiful, more bright than all, and that it left for Esther.

It was the year after he died—the first New Year's day since Robbie died, so you see how she shrank from its coming. For God had not told her about the blessing. Neither in the silence of the twilight, nor the hush of the star-lit skies, nor the voice of the low, cool winds that crept in at her little window had ever told her; nor in the chime of the church-bells, nor in her evening prayer. She knew nothing about the blessing, and so she shrank from the day.

She would have been Robbie's wife by this time, if God had not taken him. Robbie's wife!

She was thinking of this, over and over, over and over, while she stood there at the door, watching the chilly pale-red sunset, the last sunset of the sorrowful year. Robbie's wife! Never to be Robbie's wife! Never to be Robbie's now, till death should take her to him, and that was so long—so long to wait. Thinking, too, of the tear-stained letters and the little picture, which were all she had left of Robbie now; and of the nameless, pitiful grave away on the foul prison grounds. That Robbie should ever lie there! Such a brave soldier was he, and would have been so proud to die in battle. So tender was he in his memories of home, and would have been so glad to lie in the old church-yard, under the daisies and buttercups, where he walked softly when he was a little child. Well; it could not be. There were no daisies and buttercups for Robbie now; hot tears dropping down among them; none to come at nightfall, and whisper to his poor dumb resting-place a little word of love. It could not be. Only He who had decreed it knew why. Esther sometimes wondered why, but she never doubted that there was a very tender reason hidden away somewhere. She never doubted that he was always wise and tender. Why he had smitten her she did not know; but because he had smitten her, she never once let go her trusting hand from his, or hid her upturned loving face before him.

You see she was no thinker—this girl; from the flower in the garden, up to the mysteries of eternity, she never philosophized about anything. She simply accepted it. I hope you will not think her quite unworthy of your notice. Is it, or is it not, a blessing sometimes to have the soul of a child—a soul that shall never grow old? In other words, a soul that is too crystalline to hold a doubt. I do not know. Do you? Esther used to think sometimes, in her little appealing way, that it was hard; indeed it was hard, this living quite without Robbie. As to-night, looking far away into the sunset, thinking how that bit of a letter came, one year to-morrow, with the beautiful wish: "A happy New Year!" How beautiful it was to her and to him; how bright with its coming-home pictures; how dear with its sweet prophecies of untried, golden days, only they two had known. Only they two knew now. For he must know, Robbie must. He could not forget; she felt sure he could not forget.

Who was there to wish Esther a happy New Year now? What wishes of pitying friends, tender and true as they might be, could ever make a New Year happy to Esther now? But it was coming, the lonely, pitiless year, that could not be warded off or turned away from, or entreated to stay its footsteps; the year that must be met, and faced, and lived, like—God only knew how many others. It was coming. To-morrow it would be upon her. The days would creep into nights, and the nights would fade into their mornings; the weeks would come and go, and so—God only knew how long—her "vacant days go on" and on. Oh! if she need not have to bear it, the merry year! If she need not hear the glad, gay voices, and watch the happy faces, and feel her way along in her own darkness through the great light world, through the long, long year! If she might lie down under the snow in such sleep as Robbie slept in the prison-yard, and that none should call her back to it—the bare, blank year!

But who sent the year? If Esther ever forgot, it was only for a moment. The cup which had been given her, she had not drank with childish cries. Albeit she was no thinker, she was wise enough to know that He had said unto her, "Live," had said: "For the night cometh wherein no man can work." Until the night came, she had no right to wrap herself in darkness that might be felt. Life meant work; yes, and sunlight too, however pale and thin it fell through rifted clouds. Turn to your philosophy, if you choose. Do systems piled upon systems ever strike a deeper depth than this?

So Esther had tried to live, in her patient way, and tried to be thankful for such mercies as God had left her, and tried—oh! she had tried very, very hard to look upon her future, and say that it was well. She thought of it, this night, going over the old argument with herself, and turning her face, touched into stillness by a prayer, toward the dying brightness of the west.

She made a picture just then—such a picture as you would have taken into your heart, I think, if you had seen it, and kept a little while, very tenderly. She stood just within the doorway of the old brown house, her dress—Esther did not wear mourning (her mother thought it was silly)—fluttering a little in the wind, her hands thrown down and folded into each other, her face, with the low brown hair upon a quiet forehead, full in the chilly red light—the lonely, pale light that fitted the face. The mouth might have been a girlish mouth; the eyes might have been merry eyes. There was nothing there now but that stillness of a prayer, as if the girl's being, agonies and joys alike, had resolved itself into that stillness of a prayer. The dying light died out of the west at last, and left the lonely face in shadow.

"Esther!" called her mother then from the house.

Esther stirred a little, the peace and the worship fading out of her eyes, a momentary pain sharp in them. But it was only for a moment. She turned then, and went in; and the prayer went with her. Her mother sat by the fire knitting; she looked up carelessly.

"I want you to get supper, child. You'll catch your death out there."

"Yes, mother; I did not know it was time."

She laid aside her shawl, and put on her apron, and began, in her quiet way, to boil the kettle and cut the bread.

"I don't see what you will stay dreamin' and peerin' out-doors for," began Mrs. Searle complainingly; "you never will be like other girls."

Esther cut and cut upon her bread, but made no answer.

"Any body else but you would ha' gone to the apple-pearin' down to the deacon's to-night, and been glad of the chance," continued her mother, rounding off her toe with an emphasis.

Esther went to the closet for the cups and saucers.

"And any body but you would go about like other folks, and go sleighin' with the deacon's Jim, and——"

"Mother!"

"Laws a massy! what's the matter now?" Mrs. Searle dropped her knitting at the sharp, appealing voice.

"Mother! mother!"

The girl stood just as she had stood, the plate half in her hand, half upon the table. The cry, perhaps, was involuntary.

"Struck dumb? What ails you, for the land's sake, Esther?"

She came then and sank down at her mother's knee. There was a certain pleading in her outstretched hands, for compassion, for help, for love, for something, that was pitiful to see.

"Mother, if you only won't talk to me to-night—not to-night!"

Mrs. Searle took up her knitting and coughed. Hard-hearted? Not in the least. Simply astonished, puzzled, wondering; no more capable of understanding this her child than the very dumb mood of the chair she sat on. Not an ungentle mother if the girl were sick, loving her in her own way as mothers can; but she was—well, just what she was. You know. It is the old story. Why God ever made these two mother and child, was one of his mysteries.

Esther, with her face hidden, sat there a moment, quivering. Then she rose, went back to the table, and stood so, her back turned. This, momentary something that had swept like a wave over her was gone. She turned around with a smile, and if you treasure rare smiles in your memory, you would have found a place for this:

"Kiss me, mother, please?"

"Well, I never!" said Mrs. Searle, and put her arms around her neck. Then she went on with her knitting, and by way of conversation, inquired if Esther had seen Meta Hunt's wedding-dress, how many petticoats she wore with it, and how much the veil cost.

Esther set the table, and drew the water and made coffee, as she did on every other night, with the soft step that never grew rough, and the low voice that never was impatient, and the smile still upon her face. For Esther thought perhaps she was wrong, since she never philosophized. Esther thought this was what it meant—the New Year's eve, and the long, long year. It was all God had left her. What had he left her—to sweep and dust and help her mother bake, and light her father's pipe—it was hers to glorify, even as she would have glorified her own happy home, by the patient voice and willing hand. Ah! if that were possible, possible!

But Esther kept the smile upon her face, and drew her water, and made the coffee, and set the table, and listened to her mother's talk, and never knew she was a hero.

Down, deep in her heart she crushed the pictures that came with the New Year's eve, and called and cried for her to look at them, and would not go away. Ah! how they came and came, the sorrowful pictures! Robbie—his face, his voice, his smile—over and over! Always Robbie! Coming home at night she waiting for him as she now waited for her father; sitting beside her at their own little table, on which she should have laid the plates as she was laying them now; drawing his chair up to her beside the fire, looking into her eyes the long, long evening. Oh! the sweet, sorrowful pictures, the clamorous pictures that came and came, and would not go away!

But still Esther kept the smile upon her face, and drew her water, and made the coffee, and set the table, and listened to her mother's talk, and never knew she was a hero.

Presently her father came in, and Esther hung up his hat and lighted his pipe.

"Terrible cold out!" said the old man querulously. "Esther, gal, do put more wood on that fire." He never thought to thank her, you see; it never occurred to him. Why should it! It was a little thing, a very little thing. But to spend one's life suffocating among those little things, to spend one's life in hanging up hats, and lighting pipes, one's life; not the mere bare years, but the brain and the heart; the hot young energies, the passionate loving and longing; and none to speak the grateful word and kiss away the tears, and rest the aching head!

It is pitiful, isn't it?

This, you see, was Esther's life, and this is what it meant. When she looked upon her future, and said it was well.

Supper was over and cleared away. There was no one to notice that Esther did not eat; the father had taken his almanac, the mother gone back to her knitting, and Esther, her face somewhat pale in the lamp-light, was stooping low over her sewing to hide it, when there came a little knock at the door, and Meta came in. Meta, you know, was Robbie's sister, and Esther's face flushed tenderly.

"Meta! it is so good in you. I did not expect you to-night!"

"I thought I must run over a minute, Esther—the last time, you know." The girl sat down full in the lamp-light. It was a pretty, tender face, bright with its timid hopes and fresh young love, very, very bright—far younger than the face beside it, with the prayer in her eyes; you might have counted the difference by five years. Yet of the two girls, Meta Hunt had lived the longer in the world—this curious world.

"So you cal'clate on bein' married about twelve o'clock, I hear tell," said Mrs. Searle, looking up. If the mournful contrast of those two faces in the lamp-light struck her at all, it only struck her with a sort of impatience that Esther had lost her beauty, and never would look like other girls.

"So George says," said Meta, with a little happy blush.

Esther put her arm around her and kissed her, making more and more mournful that mournful contrast.

"He always said we should be married on New Year's day, it is so pleasant, somehow. Esther, did you decide to wear your white dress?"

"Anything you please, Meta."

She stood smiling down into the girl's upturned, happy eyes—smiling, smiling down.

But somehow the upturned, happy eyes saddened at that smile, and Meta's hand stole softly into hers.

"If ever I see a couple set a sight on each other, it's you and George!" put in Mrs. Searle appropriately.

Meta was still watching that smile. She wished Esther would not smile so. She wished she would put her head on her shoulder and cry a little.

But Esther did not cry. She only smiled, and smiled, and talked in her cheery way about to-morrow, with her little jokes about the dress, George, and the guests, and the flowers, and smiled, and smiled.

"I always meant Esther should wear book-muslin. Your'n come from Boston, didn't it?" observed Mrs. Searle considerately.

The blood left the girl's face for a moment, but that was all.

Presently Meta said she must go, and the two went out on the steps together. The night was very dark; only the light from the house-windows fell far upon the snow. Meta stood within it, her pretty girlish face all aglow. Esther stood within it, her face in shadow.

"Meta!"

"Esther! Esther!"

"God bless you, Meta. God bless you, my sister; I think you are my sister, Meta. I think so; I think so, somehow."

The girl could only sob, clinging to her.

"Esther, I can't bear it! If you only wouldn't try to smile so!"

"Why shouldn't I smile, Meta? I am very glad for you—oh! so very, very glad"—softly. Then presently: "Robbie would be so glad, too, Meta."

They stood there clinging to each other—these two girls whom God was leading, each in his own good way. And the merry winds of the New Year's eve swept by them, laden with the New Year's stories. Beautiful, beautiful stories, Meta thought. And Esther thought—what did Esther think? None had told her yet about the blessing.

At last Esther kissed Robbie's sister with a long, long kiss.

"Good night, Meta!"

"Good night, Esther!"

Through the golden light from the window passed the happy girlish face, and on, to hide its blushes in the dark walk homeward. She looked back once. Esther was still standing in the doorway, with the lonely face in the shadow, her hands thrown down and folded.

Meta carried the little picture in her heart for many, many years.

Esther stood in the doorway, her hands thrown down and folded, until the girl was out of sight. Asking, perhaps, one dumb, stifled question of this New Year's eve wondering a little why it should leave her nothing, nothing of all the happiness with which the great world was filled to-night. Ah! for Esther did not know about the blessing, the beautiful, bright blessing which, even now, was coming to her, and she to it, surely, surely.

She stood in the doorway, her hands thrown down and folded, until her mother's voice came sharply from the house.

"Esther! Esther, child!"

She went in. It was not a face with which to sit down in the lamp-light, and stitch away upon her father's shirt, and hear her mother talk of Meta's wedding. Hardly a face for that!

Mrs. Searle looked up over her spectacles.

"Well, I do declare, I believe you're gone crazy, dreamin' and peerin,' out there again—always dreamin' and peerin'.

"Esther, do you know what the thermometer is?" remarked her father in his precise tone.

"I am going out to walk," said Esther quietly, very quietly; but her face was turned away.

Mrs. Searle resumed her knitting in despair.

"Well, I say for't, Esther Searle, you are gone crazy! Father why don't you tell her she shan't stir a step such a night as this?"

"Ah! ahem! the thermometer's only two above, Esther."

"I must be off, alone. I mean I want to walk for a few minutes," said the girl, her face still turned away. Then she shut the door upon her mother's unfinished sentence—Esther could not bear to be rude, but there were other things she could not bear, as well, just then—went up stairs put on her hood and cloak, and hurried out into the still, dark night.

When she had passed through the gate, she came back, for some reason, she did not know why, and looked in at the window, the warm homelike window, where the old people were sitting by the fire. Did she hear one whisper of the blessing that was coming, or they?

If she heard it, she did not understand. She turned away from the warm window, and the firelight, and the aged faces there within it, then out again, where the night was dark and still. The sharp, fresh wind whirled about her, and the snow lay deep under her feet.

She turned aside from the road where the sleighing parties shot by, and the merry voices sang, and the happy faces showed in the light from happy home windows. It was no place for Esther, to-night

So she made her way off into the fields, where the snow lay white and unbroken. She had no fear of the loneliness; she did not mind the deep cold drifts through which she waded. For there had come one of those few hours which did come sometimes into the girls patient life, when her soul cried bitterly unto God, who had smitten her, and to be alone with Him was all that she could do.

So, walking on and on, her hands thrown down and folded, with the snow below and before her and the night around her, she talked with him, and he with her. Perhaps, too, with Robbie—I do not know.

It was a picture—the poor lonely figure that the happy New Year had forgotten and passed by, the crowned triumphant figure for which the blessing waited.

Down over the fields a ravine worked its way to the river, a steep place, with rocks at the bottom. At one point it was crossed by what we call, in country parlance, a "dry bridge." It had stood there for many years, serving for a narrow foot-path, and safe enough. It was old now, and water-soaked; the snow had fallen on it, a heavy weight.

Esther, walking on and on, neither knowing nor caring whither, came at length to the ravine and the little bridge, and stopped, merely to wonder whether she had better go home, or if she would be missed to stay out a little longer—that was all.

Nearer and nearer came the beautiful blessing—she to it and it to her.

Esther stepped upon the little bridge, wading through the snow, and reached the middle of it, wading through the snow, and, turning, looked down into the blackness, where the rocks were sharp.

Well, when the bridge rocked and swayed and creaked; when, with a groan like the groan of a human thing, it toppled and fell crashing down—there was one swift conscious instant, and in that instant, will you believe it, that Esther Searle gave thanks to God?

It must have been hours before she died, lying there alone in the snow, arousing now and then from her stupors to feel the chill of the wind and see the far sky dimly. Dreams of Robbie came and went, always of Robbie. For now she should be Robbie's wife at last at last, after the long waiting, and the weary days and sleepless nights. They were all over now for Robbie's wife.

Dreams, too, of Another: he who of all the blessings had chosen for her this, most bright and most beautiful; he who had never forgotten to love her, who knew how patiently she had waited for Robbie, and how hard it had been; he who was faithful to his promise, and in this her lonely dying never for one moment left her.

The bells of the village church rung out at last for the joyful midnight, rang out the old worn year, and the old worn life, the pain and the struggles after peace that never came, and rang in home and Robbie.

And how did Esther spend her New Year—how? Verily, it is the unanswered problem of ages how this child spent her beautiful New Year.

When the morning sunlight came, Meta and George clasped hands and looked upon the quiet upturned face, but shed no tears.

"I think I am happier now than yesterday," said Meta, thinking of Robbie, you know, and stooping to kiss her sister.—Hours at Home.

ONE WAY TO CURTAIL EXPENSE.—An exchange says that a man named Jameson in Cincinnati wishing to curtail household expenses, adopted a novel mode to effect his object. He kissed the servant girl one morning when he knew Mrs. J. would see him. Results—discharged servant girl and twelve dollars a month saved. We have been experimenting a little in this way, but up to the present writing, the thing don't win. But we intend to persevere.—Vinton Eagle.

The Balloon Wedding.

The announcement that a bona fide marriage was to take place above the clouds in Professor Thomas S. C. Lowe's balloon, the United States, yesterday at two o'clock in the afternoon, caused a great crowd to assemble in the large enclosure from whence the bridal party were to take their departure from this terrestrial sphere. About three thousand persons, more than half of whom were women, were congregated around the balloon at the corner of Sixth Avenue and Fifty-ninth street, while probably as many more occupied positions on the roofs of buildings and lofty rocks which overlooked the enclosure.

THE BRIDAL CAR.

At one end of the raised platform over which the partially distended balloon oscillated fitfully in the strong gale, was erected a pretty gate of woven evergreens, bearing the motto, "Ever Thus," through which the bridal party were to pass to the balloon. The bridal car was very handsome, the outside being covered with gold and crimson damask, and the inside cushioned round, with pale green silk, with a capacity for four voyagers. The car was also elegantly tented with pink silk, bordered round with drooping festoons of lace of bridal white.

THE PARTIES CONCERNED.

Miss Mary West Jenkins, late of St. Louis Missouri was the blushing bride; Professor John W. Boynton, M. D., of Syracuse, New York, was the happy and eccentric man. They had been engaged for some time, and according to advertisement, it was expected that they would be accompanied by the Rev. F. DeWitt Talmadge of Philadelphia, to the pure, untrammeled realms of space, and there united in the holy bonds of wedlock with the eternal stars for witnesses, and the sun and moon for groomsman and bridesmaid, the fires of sunset for their hymeneal torches, and the blue empyrean for their domestic sphere. Of course there was poetical novelty enough to attract throngs of sight-seers who, however, were compelled to wait two dreary hours in the cold open air, keeping their hands and feet from freezing by the incessant applause and clamoring for the spectacle to commence, as they had paid their admittance fee in good faith.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRIDAL PARTY.

Owing to the accident which had taken place at the Manhattan Gas Works, Professor Lowe was compelled to make his own gas, which occasioned considerable delay, but about four o'clock, the balloon was ready for her voyage, and soon after, a carriage containing the bridal party, drove into the deep enclosure, from the Fifth avenue side amid roars of laughter from the people, and deafening cries of "Hi! Hi!" "Here they come," "I see the bride!" "Look at the old man!" and similar expressions. A moment after two little girls, half-clad in white muslin and cheap spangles, and shivering with the cold, sprang from the first carriage, and scattered flowers along the platform, which was now densely crowded with spectators, whom the police, with all their efforts were hardly able to keep back from the narrow path which had been cleared for the passage of the bridal party, consisting of the bride and bridegroom, the two daughters of the latter, and the sister of the former, with a few other, friends.

THE BRIDE AND BRIDEGROOM.

Soon after the arrival of the party, it was given out that the marriage ceremony had taken place a few hours before at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and that the only legal ceremony to be performed on high, would be the signing of the marriage contract. The reason given for this change of programme was that the clergyman of the occasion had to return to Philadelphia by the next train; but the actual reason probably was that the reverend gentleman, accustomed to operate solely in this mundane sphere, had backed out at the eleventh hour, and tied the knot in the manner with which we groveling mortals are usually contented.

"Which is the gal what's to be yoked?" asked a vulgar fellow at our elbow. "That is the bride," was replied instinctively, indicating a beautiful woman of about five and twenty, who had just alighted from the carriage.

She was tall and comely, with bright, dark eyes, and a somewhat nervous smile about her pretty lips, as she passed through the throngs with a step-daughter hardly younger than herself, on either side. She was dressed in a plain but elegant traveling dress of dove-colored silk; her rich dark hair was modestly disposed beneath an elegant bonnet of the latest style, and she kept her eyes cast down as if sad and dejected. The "happy man" was a large, portly gentleman, about double the age of his new wife The latter looked pretty and sweet as she was lifted into the gay cabin of the air-ship; but as the husband stepped over the edge of the car, there was a pitiless laugh from the crowd, as though he had made that one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, of which the poet speaks. Owing to the scarcity of gas, it was found impossible for Miss Lula Boynton to accompany her father and step-mother, as was originally intended. Her place was therefore occupied by a little sister of the bride. Professor Lowe then stepped in and all was in readiness.

The ballast was on board. A dozen men were clinging to the unsteady car to keep it down.

"Give us one good swing boys, and then let us sail!" cried Professor Lowe. The next moment there was a strong puff—a flapping sound like that of wings in motion—the crowd below caught one more glimpse of the pale-cheeked bride with the nervous smile on her lips, and then the air-ship was afloat and rising slowly on her heavenward way. She rose but slowly, however. The Professor emptied a sand-bag just in time to clear the eaves of the little house at one corner of the enclosure. As it was, the car came squarely in contact with the flag-staff on the roof; but the slender mast bent like a willow wand, and the next moment they were clear and rising rapidly, with the Professor waving his hat triumphantly over the side of the car.

THE BRIDAL VOYAGE

was a happy success, and is thus described by one of the voyagers, who is evidently of a poetic turn:

It was not near as cold as we thought it would be. Immediately after clearing the walls of the enclosure, the balloon seemed to become perfectly motionless, and the world sank from beneath our feet like a peopled dream. The city was spread below us like a map with its hundred spires and myriad casements gleaming in the last flash of sunset, which flooded the west with pallid gold with here and there an island of white cloud. For a moment we seemed to be perfectly motionless, and then by watching the Central Park directly beneath us, we saw that we were moving rapidly toward the North.

Our nervousness was quickly gone, and we were soon chatting merrily. Lesser and dimmer grew the world, as we soared and swept along over Harlem and East river, with its hundred isles, with the wide, glittering waters of the Sound beyond, like a dazzling shield, and hamlets, hills and woods—the latter flushed with autumnal purple and gold, fleeting far beneath us like the vistas of an enchanted realm.

It all seemed strange and fairy-like. It brought to mind the "Day-Dream" of Tennyson. By a slight stretch of the fancy, the bride became the sleeping beauty, newly awakened by her true-love's kiss; by another stretch—quite a stretch, it is true—Professor Boynton became the fairy prince, "lighter footed than the fox," who bore her to his father's halls. It was the sweet Day-Dream of youth and love.

And on her lover's arm she leant,
And round her waist she felt it fold,
And far across the hills they went,
In that new world which is the old;
Across the hills and far away,
Beyond their utmost purple rim,
And deep into the dying day,
The happy princess followed him."

Even as in the sweet day-dream, the happy couple in the air ship left the world behind and mounted star-ward, as if to make their bridal home in some bright bower beyond the stars.

And o'er them many a sliding star,
And many a merry wind was borne,
And, streamed through many a golden bar,
The twilight melted into morn.

* * * *

And o'er them many a flowing range
Of vapor buoyed the crescent bark,
And, rapt through many a rosy change,
The twilight died into the dark.

We understand that the newly wedded pair will remain some days in New York before seeking their home in Syracuse. May their days be of silver and their nights of gold!

Our Financial Condition.

[In the Chicago Times we find the following article, credited in that paper to the Anglo-American Times, (London) Oct. 27.]

The public debt of the United States, as shown by the books of the treasury department on the 30th of September, stood as follows:

Debt bearing interest in coin	$411,658,191 80
Interest	65,001,670 60
Debt bearing interest in lawful money	1,260,099,120 45
Interest	72,527,644 75
Debt on which interest has ceased	1,389,320 09
Debt bearing no interest	366,891,093 84
Total amount outstanding	2,744,947,726 17
Total interest	137,529,216 25

These figures represent a stupendous sum, and it has been fashionable among a certain class of men to predict that the United States would never pay their debts, but that national bankruptcy would be the inevitable result of the war. Now let us see how far the predictions of these croakers are likely to be borne out by facts.

The statement of the public debt on Sept. 30 shows a reduction on that of Aug. 30 of no less than $12,742,000, and of interest of over $500,000. Thus in an interval of thirty days the American government has reduced its debt over two and a half millions of pounds sterling. This fact is most gratifying and assuring. The rebellion is finished; the armies of the south are disbanded; the states lately arrayed in opposition to the national authority have returned to social order and commercial and industrial vigor, and the tax-paying powers of the states already so grandly and conspicuously demonstrated, will in future be augmented instead of diminished. The revenue returns for the quarter ending Sept. 30 show a result entirely unprecedented in the history of any country. They are as follows:

Customs paid in gold	$36,135,452
Internal revenue in currency	93,000,000

Thus the revenue of the country for the last three months is nearly $146,000,000, or at the rate of $560,000,000 per annum. England owes a debt in round numbers of £800-000,000 sterling, while her annual revenue is only about £70,000,000. The United States debt is a third less than that of England, while her revenue is more than two-thirds greater, amounting to more than £112,000,000 sterling per annum! And this, too, at a period when she is just emerging from her troubles, and when her trade is only just beginning to recover from the prostration of the war. Indeed, judging from the results already attained, it is not too much to expect that the annual revenue of the United States, without additional taxation will reach $130,000,000 within the next two years. And even allowing nothing for increase of wealth and population, and consequent increase of revenue, the entire national debt, if reduced only at the average rate of the last 30 days, will be extinguished within 20 years.

These are plain unvarnished facts, and they cannot fail to have their due effect upon the capitalists of England. The American secretary of the treasury has plainly declared that he does not desire a dollar of the national debt should be taken in Europe. Nevertheless, capital is not bound by bonds of nationality. Its natural tendency is to seek the best market, and it is as natural for English capitalists to invest in the national securities of the United States, which guarantee such returns for money as no other investment in public securities in the world offers, as it is for water to seek the level.

We have thus given some idea of the present prosperity of the United States; but we should be accused of extravagance if we were to write as they deserve of the astounding mineral and agricultural resources of the country. Take the coal and iron trade alone. The coal area of Great Britain is 5,400 square miles; that of the single state of Pennsylvania upwards of 12,000 square miles or more than double that of Great Britain. Coal and iron are the foundations of England's greatness, and in both these resources England is surpassed by the state of Pennsylvania. It is true that these great interests are not fully developed, but the ratio of their progressive development for the last ten years has been astonishing beyond computation. The United States are also increasing in population beyond the wildest conjectures of dreamers a few years ago. No one who knows anything of the great agricultural and mineral resources of the Mississippi and Missouri valleys, and of the vast tide of immigration constantly pouring into those regions, can doubt that the country will continue to increase in population even in excess of its present ratio, which within three decades will give it a total population of 100,000,000 and upwards.

And yet there are some who say America cannot pay her debts!

Mothers, Put Your Children to Bed.

There may be some mothers who feel it a self-denial to leave their parlors or firesides or work to put their little children to bed. They think that the nurse could do it just as well; that it of no consequence "to hear the children say their prayers."

Now, setting aside the pleasure of opening the little bed and tucking the darlings up, there are really important reasons why the mother should not yield that privilege to any one. In the first place, it is the time of all times, when the child is inclined to show its confidence and affection. All its little secrets come out with more truth and less restraint; its naughtiness through the day can be reproved and talked over with less excitement, and with the tenderness and calmness necessary to make a permanent impression.

If the little one has shown a desire to do well and be obedient, its effort and success can be acknowledged in a manner that need not render it vain or self-satisfied. We must make it a habit to talk to our children, in order to get from them an expression of their feelings. We cannot understand the character of these little ones committed to our care unless we do. And if we do not know what they are, we shall not be able to govern them wisely, and educate them as their different natures demands.

Certainly it would be unwise to excite young children by too much conversation with them just before putting them to bed. Every mother who carefully studies the temperament of her children, will know how to manage them in this respect.

But of this all mothers may be assured, that the last words at night are of the greatest importance to even the babies of the flock; the very tones of the voice they last listened to, make an impression on their sensitive organs.

Mother, do not think the time or strength wasted which you spend in reviewing the day with your little boy or girl; do not neglect to teach it how to pray; and to pray for it in simple, earnest language that it can understand. Sooth and quiet its little heart after the experience of the day. It has had its disappointments and trials, as well as its play and pleasures: it is ready to throw its little arms around your neck and take its good-night kiss.—Mothers' Magazine.

Danford's Steam Generator.

The proposed revolution in steam boilers announced in this paper some months since seems now likely to be fulfilled in the successful working of the generator invented by Mr. E. Danford, of Geneva, Illinois, should it prove what the highest scientific authorities now predict, it will utterly revolutionize the present method of obtaining steam power. We had come to distrust the practicability of advantageously raising steam by injection, but confess now that there seems small room for doubt. In the Chicago Republican we find the apparatus so well described that we transfer to our own columns the entire article.

The great problem how to cheapen steam power and rob it of its terrors, seems to have been solved by an Illinois inventor. We had the pleasure a few days since, of examining the superheated steam generator of Mr. E. Danford, of Genrva, now in practical operation at No. 90 West Lake street. There, in a space which might be covered by a medium-sized kitchen-table, is a steam engine of fifteen horse power, all complete, driving two sets of burr-stones, and grinding corn at the rate of 27½ bushels per hour. This engine is driven by steam superheated to from 500 to 600 degrees Fahrenheit. The immense power of this agent may be judged when we state that steam in the locomotive boiler at 100 pounds pressure to the square inch is only 331 degrees of temperature.

Mr. Danford's steam generator consists of a hollow cast-iron globe, 2½ inches thick, suspended in an ordinary furnace. An iron tube enters the globe at the top and is conducted down to a little below the centre where it terminates in a rose sprinkler. By means of an injection pump, about a table spoonful of water is forced through this tube into the globe at each stroke in the form of spray. The spray does not come in contact with the sides of the generator, for before it can reach them it is expanded into superheated steam. There is no danger of explosion, for no water touches the iron to cause an explosion. The globe will sustain a pressure of 4,000 lbs to the inch. It never becomes red hot, because the steam absorbs the heat as fast as it is generated. Hence there is no danger of weakening the iron, by overheating, or burning it out.

Mr. Danford has demonstrated that there is a positive limit to the expansive power of steam, and that it is impossible as many engineers believe, to resolve it into an explosive gas. His generator has now been in use since May last, and he defies any engineer in the world to blow it up. If this be the fact the importance of his invention in a humane point of view is beyond computation.

But absolute safety is not its only recommendation. It is vastly cheaper than the old tubular border. A 15-horse power generator and furnace, complete, may be furnished ready for use for $200. A steam boiler of the same capacity would cost $1,500. Nor is its saving in first cost its most valuable recommendation. Twenty-five gallons of water give the same power as 75 in the ordinary boiler, and there is a saving of over 40 per cent. in fuel in its favor, while so far as appears, it will endure for an indefinite period.

A company has been organized for the dissemination of this invention, with Horatio Allen, of the Novelty works, New York, as president. Its capital is $2,100,000, and it purposes to grant the right of using the invention to manufacturers throughout the world, for a reasonable royalty upon each horse power. If the invention realizes all that is claimed for it by the inventor and other practical engineers, it will work a revolution in steam power. Henceforth, the most valuable and most dangerous of human agencies will become the most docile and beneficent. Those who are interested in scientific improvements will find it worth their while to make a personal examination of this very remarkable invention.

County and Town Railway Bonds.

The United States circuit court of Chicago has, by recent decisions, sustained the State courts of Iowa in perpetually enjoining counties and cities from levying or collecting a tax for the payment of bonds issued for railway purposes, that have been declared illegal by the State supreme court. The city of Keokuk alone, has almost as heavy a debt outstanding, as the state of Iowa, and being immediately interested in the pending suits for a long time past, should feel great financial relief. Western towns and counties, however, should offer some compromise in liquidation of their heavy debt issues made in times of speculation and inflation, and so long held as unavailable property by innocent purchasers. The city of Keokuk, committed itself to a compromise settlement of its debt previous to the above decision being rendered.

A WATCH AND ITS HISTORY.—A very interesting case in the annals of the Police Court came to light last week. In the year 1854 a young Irishman of good parentage emigrated to Chicago and became clerk in a certain railroad office in the city. He had previously been a bank clerk in London, and before leaving was presented with a valuable gold watch, worth about $250. He remained here some nine years, and maintained an excellent reputation for integrity and attention to his duties. But in the early part of 1863, taking a trip with some friends among the purlieus of the city, he happened in a saloon of doubtful reputation, and is supposed to have been drugged. In this condition he was robbed of all his valuables, the watch included. Being of an ingenuous and tender disposition, this loss so prayed upon him that he took to drinking, and soon became unfit for business. Throwing up his situation he returned to his home, and has not since been heard from. On last Saturday morning, while Sergeant Mergenthaler was traveling a beat on State street, he noticed a drunken man lying on the sidewalk. Before he reached the spot he saw another man slyly step up to the drunkard and examine his pockets for valuables. The officer arrested both parties, sent the drunkard to the Armory in a butcher's wagon and walked thither with the other prisoner. On this prisoner's person was found the watch which had caused so much trouble. It was exhibited in the Police Court Thursday morning, and is a most costly and splendid work of art. The thief is held on a charge of assault with intent to commit robbery, and also for the actual theft of the watch. A friend of the ex-clerk received news of the discovery and will send news to Ireland to his old acquaintance, while Justice Milliken in the meantime retains the watch in his possession.

Notice to Young and Middle Aged Men

WHO DESIRE TO ENGAGE IN ACTIVE, SUCCESSFUL BUSINESS.

Important to Parents Having Sons to Educate.

THE PROPER TRAINING TO MAKE USEFUL, SUCCESSFUL MEN.

The Age and Exigencies of the Times Demand the Eastman System of Business Education.

A Model Commercial College in Chicago.

There has been built up, in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., by H. G. Eastman, LL. D., the largest and most popular Institution of Learning on the American Continent, numbering Thirteen Hundred Students, and occupying six buildings. He suggested the best Course of Study for Practical, Useful Education, and the best mode of Commercial College Instruction, ever adopted in this or any other country.

Its largely increasing patronage in the West induced him to extend its usefulness by establishing a WESTERN INSTITUTION of the College at CHICAGO, under the Principalship of Prof. E. P. EASTMAN.

Its success already has no parallel in the history of Educational Institutions, it having a more extended patronage to-day than any Commercial or Mercantile College in the West.

It is the largest, best furnished, and most complete Institution of the kind in the World, in appointments and facilities.

The Course of Study comprises every variety of Business and Finance, from Retail to Banking Operations, by the great system of ACTUAL BUSINESS INSTRUCTION. Book-keeping in all its various methods, Business Forms, Terms and Usages, Business Writing, Correspondence, Commercial Arithmetic, Commercial Law, Advertising, Partnership Settlements, Detecting Counterfeit Money, thoroughly taught.

Its TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT is the Best and Most Extensive in the Country.

Evening Instruction in all branches is given to those who are unable to attend the Daily Session.

Graduates are assisted to Situations in Government Departments and the Cities of the Country.

Students are admitted any week day or evening in the year. A common-school education is all the necessary qualification. There are no examinations at commencing.

Full information may be had at the College, Metropolitan Hall, Chicago, Ill., or by addressing the Principal,

E. P. EASTMAN.

The Science of Health!

Every Man his own Physician.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS,

AND

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

Disorders of the stomach, Liver & Bowels.

The Stomach is the great centre which influences the health or the disease of the system—Abused or debilitated by excess—indigestion, offensive breath and physical prostration are the natural consequences. Allied to the brain, it is the source of headaches, mental depression, nervous complaints and unrefreshing sleep. The liver becomes affected and generates bilious disorders, pains in the side &c. The bowels sympathize by Costiveness, Diarrhoea and Dysentry. The principal action of these Pills is on the stomach, and the liver, lungs, bowels and kidneys participate in their recuperative and regenerative operation.

Erysipelas and Salt Rheum.

Are two of the most common and virulent disorders prevalent on this continent, to these the Ointment is especially antagonistic its "modus operandi" is first to eradicate the venom and then complete the cure.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Ulcers.

Cases of many years' standing, that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions on the Skin.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic diseases, are eradicated and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Female Complaints.

Whether in the young or old, married or single, at the dawn of Womanhood, or the turn of life, these tonic medicines display so decided an influence that a marked improvement is soon preceptible in the health of the patient. Being a purely vegetable preparation, they are safe and reliable remedy for all classes of famales in every condition of health and station of life.

Piles and Fistula

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emolient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healing qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills should be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Mercurial Eruptions,	Swelled Glands
Sprains,	Burns,	Piles,
Sore Legs,	Stiff Joints,	Chapped Hands
Tetter,	Rheumatism,	Sore Breasts,
Chilblains,	Ringworm,	Sore Heads,
Ulcers,	Fistula,	Sore Throats,
Gout,	Salt Rheum,	Scalds,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,	Skin Diseases,
Wounds of all kinds.

CAUTION—None are genuine unless the words "HOLLOWAY, NEW YORK AND LONDON," are discernable as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

 Sold at the manufactory of Professor HOLLOWAY 80 Maiden Lane, New York and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine, throughout the civilized world.

These Bitters are prepared, in pure Bourbon Whiskey from a combination of over twenty different kinds of roots, barks and herbs, which act in perfect concert, one with other, prepared from the original formula given by the great chief, Red Jacket, to Dr Chapin, who used them successfully in his practice for many years, and by their use gained so great a popularity in the treatment and cure of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Constipation, Sick and Nervous Headache, Fever and Ague, and all diseases arising from torpid liver or indigestion. Persons suffering from either of these loathesome diseases will find a sure cure by the use of these Bitters, which are perfectly pure and free from all those drugs so often put up in such preparations and palmed off on an unsuspecting public. A single trial will convince the most skeptical that in the RED JACKET there is virtue which no other Bitters possess.

They strengthen and invigorate the system.
They are unequaled for general debility.
They are a sure cure for dyspepsia.
They give a good and healthy appetite.
They assist digestion.
They are the best stimulant in existence.
They are a preventive of Fever and Ague.
They relieve constipation.
They cure Nervous Headache.
They are perfectly pure and palatable

Aged persons and delicate females will find they can save large doctor's bills by the use of these Bitters.

Beware of counterfeits. The Red Jacket Bitters are only sold in bottles with our name blown on the side, and our private government stamp across the cork.

For Medicinal and Table uses, which are perfectly pure, and need only be tried to be appreciated. None genuine unless they have our gold label on each bottle, and our initials pressed in wax over the cork.

You will confer a favor on us by soliciting the Judge of Probate to publish Probate Notices in the HERALD, and you will also find it convenience to your selves to have the advertisements in the paper you receive.

☞ Those of our subscribers who are intending to bring us wood are requested to do so immediately, as we cannot wait for our supply until the mud comes on.

REASONBALE SUPPOSITIONS.—If Mr Baylis had been standing upright, when the mill-stone bursted in Hayden's mill, it is reasonable to suppose that the sixty pound boulder—which just grazed his shoulder while in a stooping posture—would have seriously damaged him. If Henry Fisher and the Doctor had not been faithfully casting up Church accounts at a late hour Saturday evening, it is reasonable to suppose that Mechanics Block would have burned down. Such hair breadth escapes are occurring daily and every wise man will endeavor to provide against them by Insurance.—Accident and fire Policies issued to order with neatness and dispatch by

S. C. STACY, Agent.

☞ The Lyceum, recently organized by the young folks has become one of the permanent institutions of the village. It has a large number of acting members and quite a number of spectators also attend its meetings. Last Monday evening there was an animated discussion upon the question of universal suffrage.—The resolution for discussion on Monday evening next is "Resolved that a Monarchal is preferable to a Republican form of government.

☞ J. D Robbins has just returned from New York where he has been for the past three weeks buying a large stock of Fancy goods for the Hollidays. He buys exclusively of manufacturers and importers, thereby enabling him to sell at the very lowest prices. He won't be beat, give him a call.

MR. EDITOR:—In your issue of the 23d, under the head of, "Almost a fire," you notice "a very mysterious occurrence" which "transpired" on Saturday night the 28th, in my building situated in Mechanics Block. From the phraseology of your article, those to whom the circumstances are unknown, might be led to infer that I occupied the premises at the time of the "mysterious occurrence." The object of this is to disabuse any reader of the article alluded to, of any such inference. The facts of the case are that the lower story of the building when the "mysterious occurrence transpired," was occupied as a shoe shop by J. W Osborne (stock uninsurred) and Mr. J. W. Wishart a dealer in Crockery and Glass-ware. J. S. WALTERS.

We certainly did not intend to convey the idea that Mr. Walters occupied the building or had any agency in originating the "mysterious occurrence" alluded to; and hereby make the "amende honorable" by saying; if any reader got such an impression he will at once dismiss it.

A FACT.—Mrs. Geo. Stacy, of Newburg making a purchase of $8, of C. H. Adam & Co., was presented with a nice scotch plaid dress worth $7,50. There is the place to fluy where you can double your money.

LECTURES.—The effort made by the officers of the Tecumseh Union Lyceum, to secure a course of lectures here during the coming winter has been a complete success. A sufficient amount has been subscribed, to ensure the procuring of six lectures, and four of the gentlemen have been engaged. Hon. J. M. Gregory, Pres. Kalamazoo College; Dr. E. O. Haven, Pres. Mich. University; Hon. E. B. Fairfield, Pres. Hillsdale College and B. F. Taylor Esq. of the Chicago Journal. We congratulate the Lyceum upon their good fortune in securing so able a corps of lecturers.

☞ Remember the lecture before the Lyceum to-morrow evening, at the Baptist Church. Mr. Gregory is an able and eloquent speaker and his lecture will doubtless be a very interesting one. Let there be a full house.

CURIOUS DISCOVERY.—A curious discovery was made one day last week by some workmen, who were engaged in fixing over an old blacksmith shop just below the Globe Mills into a dwelling house. Strips of metal and other materials were found, supposed to have been used for counterfeiting purposes. The building when occupied as a blacksmith shop, was used also, it is said, for a bogus coin manufactory at the time the notorious "Sile Doty" and his associates flourished in these parts and doubtless old "Sile himself had a hand in depositing these curiosities where they were found.

☞ All persons who have not already subscribed to the Soldiers Monument Fund and wish to do so, will please call on W. Anderson, at the Post Office, or G. W. Ketcham.

Proclamation by the President.

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God, during the year which is now coming to an end, to relieve our beloved country from the fearful scourge of civil war, and to permit us to secure the blessings of peace, unity and harmony, with a great enlargement of civil liberty; and

WHEREAS, Our Heavenly Father has also, during the year, graciously averted from us the calamities of foreign wars, pestilence and famine, while our granaries are full of the fruits of an abundant season; and

WHEREAS, Righteousness exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people:

Now, therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby recommend to the people thereof that they do set apart and observe the first Thursday of December next as a day of national thanksgiving to the Creator of the Universe for these deliverances and blessings; and I do further recommend that, on that occasion, the people make confession of our national sins against His infinite goodness, and, with one heart and one mind, implore the Divine guidance in the ways of national virtue and holiness.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 28th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1865, and of the independence of the United States the 90th.

(Signed) ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President: WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

Mrs. Martha Grinder, the wholesale woman poisoner of Pittsburg, was last Saturday sentenced to be hung.

An attempt was made to rob the County Treasurer's office in Fremont, Ohio, on last Sunday morning at one o'clock, but was discovered before they had accomplished their work, and were obliged to flee without obtaining any booty. The safe at which they were at work contained valuables to the amount of $40,0000.

A collision occurred on the Mississippi river on Friday night the 24th, 7 miles above Helena, between the steamers Post Boy and Niagara. The Niagara sunk in 20 feet of water, and 100 deck passengers, mostly discharged colored soldiers, were drowned. The cabin passengers and crew were saved.

The ship Benjamin Adams from Beaufort for Mobile, was wrecked on the 23d on Spanish Key, and 10 of the crew were drowned.

Mrs. Jane Swisshelm is to start a paper in Washington, called the "Reconstructionist."

On the 23d, Judge Gary sentenced Corbett and Fleming, convicted of the murder of Maloney in the town of Cicero near Chicago, to be hanged on the 15th of December. Their crime was particularly shocking and atrocious, the murderers and the murdered being strangers to each other.

Iowa contributed to the war 73,022 men.

The city of Ottawa has been formally inaugurated as the Canadian capital, by the meeting of the Executive council there on Tuesday last.

On the 21st, Thomas M. Thornton, a banker in Shelbyville, Ill., walked into a clothing store, and deliberately shot Lieut. Geo. Tacket four times, without a word being spoken by either party. Cause, an old grudge. The fourth shot was fatal.

William Gilpin, Republican, first Governor of the Territory, is elected to be first Governor of the State of Colorado.

In North Carolina, Worth's majority over Holden, for Governor, is some 10,000. None of the Congressmen elect can take the oath. The only candidate who could do so was defeated by a large majority.

Governor Humphreys has sent a message to the Legislature of Mississippi, recommending, among other things, that negroes be allowed to testify in courts, and that the freedmen be assured of protection.

The New York canals are to be closed December 12th.

The Superior Court of Cincinnati has decided that the colored people are entitled to the same privileges on the cars as whites.

The Shenandoah destroyed forty-six whalers and 10,252 barrels of oil, the value of which is $1,650,000.

The United States Treasury was enriched by conscience money during the year ending June 30th, to the amount of $20,876. The most of this sum came from Catholic confessionals.

A report made to the Indian Bureau states that the cost of killing a male Indian has been half a million dollars, and of killing a squaw two millions.

The Elliot-Davis prize fight, which was to have taken place at Albany, but was prevented by the police, came off subsequently in a room, and resulted in a draw, owing to foul blows.

Mr. T. K. Barrett, editor of the Laporte (Ind.) Democrat, was arrested on Monday afternoon, on a requisition from the Governor of Illinois, and taken to Peoria on the evening train. The charges against him are not stated.

Major Gee, the rebel keeper of the Salisbury prison pen, has been arrested, and is now in the old Capitol Prison to answer the charge of cruelties inflicted upon Union prisoners.

The rewards offered for the arrest of Jacob Thompson, Beverly Tucker, George N. Sanders, William G. Cleary and John H. Surratt have been revoked.

The London Times of October 31st gives a summary of the statistics of the Rinderpest in England. It says: "At length we have "got some statistics of the cattle plague, and "a ghastly look they wear. Upward of "14,000 animals are known to have been attacked by the plague since its first appearance, and of these nearly 12,000 have died. "To be sure, more than 5,000 of these victims "were killed to save curing, but they swell "the total loss of stock. As to the recoveries, they are registered just now at 707, "which would be only five per cent. on the "whole attacks."

Gov. Dillingham, of Vermont, has appointed Hon. Luke Poland, of St. Johnsbury, to fill the vacancy in the United States Senate occasioned by the death of Senator Collamer.

It is regarded as certain that the Legislature of Georgia will ratify the anti-slavery constitutional amendment, and pass laws for the protection of freedmen.

It is said the country between Louisville and Nashville is perfectly alive with wild pigeons.

A terrible state of affairs is reported to exist in Nashville, there having been eighteen deaths by violence during the past month.

Gen. Scott left New York for New Orleans last week, where he will spend the winter.

Scattering returns of the election held in California, on October 18th, for Judge of the Supreme Court, indicate the election of Sanderson, the Union candidate, by a majority of from 6,000 to 10,000.

The King of Greece has at length been compelled to yield to the popular clamor for the expulsion of his Danish Mentor, Count Sponnek. The new cabinet declined to serve under any other condition.

A Washington dispatch states that "Congress will act upon the theory that the war is not ended. It is precisely the ground occupied by the President and every one of the departments of the Government. Volunteers not yet discharged have repeatedly demanded their discharge, in compliance with their terms of enlistment, and the invariable reply is, 'The war is not yet closed.' The Treasury Department also holds, in reference to the payment of bounties, that the war still exists. The President, while he protects the freedmen with the bayonet, does it under the theory that the war has not come to an end; that is, time enough has not elapsed to satisfy the President and Congress that the people of the South are steadfastly loyal."

The Tax Commissioners in the Southern States have been instructed to postpone all sales of property now advertised until further orders.

A theatre controversy has come up in Chicago. Rev. Dr. Hatfield the well known Methodist clergyman has for two successive Sunday evenings paid his respects to these institutions as unmitigated evils, and been replied to on the stage at Mc'Vicker's Theatre, by Mrs. Cowell, an estimable and accomplished actress. The reply being avowedly not her own, Dr. H. publicly says he will not answer it unless the author owns his identity.

After the words "Look out for the Child-stealer," had been posted in glowing capitals all over the streets of Philadelphia, for two weeks, frightening mothers so that they kept their children from school, it appears that this is the title of a new play at one of the theatres and the above mode was taken to advertise it. A despicable "dodge."

The pirate Shenandoah arrived at Mersey on the 6th inst, and surrendered herself and her officers and crew to the guard ship Donegal. The officers and men were unconditionally discharged by British authorities. Waddell, her commander states that the first information he received of the close of the war, was on the 31st of August. This is undoubtedly false, as from the very necessity of the case, the captain was obliged to make port at least once a month. The vessel has been turned over to the American consul at Liverpool, and a crew placed on board to take her to New York.

GLEANINGS.

—Farmers and other wise people predict an early winter, a long one and a strong one. One of the signs is that birds early took their flight southward; another is that the husks of the growing corn were very thick and covered the ears clear to the ends.

—Minnesota sent 24,251 soldiers to the war, more than one sixth of the male population.

—The "Magdalen Asylum" which was started at Syracuse, New York, a year or so ago, has failed, and the managers are debating what disposition to make of the lot and building which they had purchased for that purpose. Only three young women had been induced to enter the asylum. The managers hope that two of these are reformed, but the third is admitted to be incorrigible. No more candidates offer, and the experiment of maintaining the establishment is admitted to be a failure.

—There died the other day in Marlboro, Ohio, an old man and his wife, within a few hours of each other. George Schafer, the deceased, was aged 76 years, 2 months and 19 days, and Elizabeth his wife, 75 years, 2 months and 20 days. They had been married 58 years, and had resided in Marlboro half a century.

The St. Paul Press is guilty of the following: "The engine "Shakopee" used upon the Minnesota Valley railroad, is not the Shakopee who was hanged at Ft. Snelling. The former is a dummy engine, the latter is an "Ingin" dem-me.

—A man in Georgia writes to a Louisville paper, contradicting the statements made in a letter from his town signed "Veritas." He says there is no man of that name in the county.

—Confederate money is the best the New York Citizen knows of. A friend, says the editor, has just given us about two thousand dollars in twenty dollar bills of that currency. They are neither signed, numbered or dated, but they are nevertheless just as good as though they were. Of what other bank-notes in the country in like condition can the same be said?

—The crown prince of Russia, having recently contemplated the ascent of the Brocken, celebrated in Goethe's Faust, ordered all the rooms in the hotel which stands on the summit of the mountain, to be reserved for his use. A party of tourists on reaching the hotel, after a laborious ascent in a snowy atmosphere, and worn out with hunger, cold and fatigue, were brutally refused admittance, although his royal highness had not yet arrived, and were only saved from starvation by the kindness of the porter of the hotel, who took the party, consisting of four gentlemen and a lady to the stables, and provided them with some refreshments until the arrival of their carriage.

—An edition of Baron Munchausen is soon to appear with 160 illustrations by Gustave.

—John Jourdan killed himself in Green Bay, Wis., by trying to lift a load beyond his strength.

—Ten cows were killed on the Ft. Wayne road last week, between Strasburg and Smithfield, a distance of ten miles. In these times of high prices for butter, this is a serious loss. Allowing cows the freedom of the road in the vicinity of the railroad track does not pay.

—As an instance of Yankee thrift, the papers tell of an old man in Massachusetts, who wears a pair of boots purchased in 1843 for $2.50. They have been worn more or less ever since the purchase.

—Not only has gold been discovered in the Dunkard Creek, Pennsylvania oil region, but we now have the announcement that a rich mine of lead had been discovered there. Gold discoveries are also reported in the oil regions of West Virginia.

—Dr. Tyng's church in New York, is to be rebuilt at an expense of about $120,000. Over $50,000 have already been subscribed for that purpose.

—The largest Sunday School in America is to be found in Cincinnati. It has 2,500 pupils.

—Mr. McDonald of Attica, Indiana, who is interested in the Wabash Petroleum and Mining Association, reports the opening of a strong vein of salt water in what is known as the Thomas well. The brine is strong enough to cure meat, and it is estimated that the well will produce 25 barrels of salt daily. This is better than oil.

—A few days ago, a single firm in Boston paid duties amounting to $70,000 in gold at the custom-house.

—The two verbs invented by the Associated Press telegraphers last week, were even worse than usual: "jailed" and "suicided."

—The overland mail to Salt Lake City costs the post office department $385,000 per annum; while the revenue therefrom amounts only to $6,200.

—On a fence in Berkshire, Mass., is painted in glaring capitals, "Use Dr. Prior's Cough Balsam," and just below, "Buy Your Gravestones at Pittsfield."

—The Winona (Minnesota) Press thus compliments a balladist of that ilk: "In this city, he is thought to be an excellent singer, only equalled in vocal execution by the sausage machine of our friend Jake Smith. Don't get mad Jake, for really we mean no offense to the machine."

—The New York Home Journal is a carefully printed paper, and seldom has typographical mistakes. In its last issue, however, it has one, and it is awful. It says: "During the first half of the present century, a Whitby gentleman married a lady in Hell." The printer got an e instead of a u in the last word.

—A member of the Tennessee Legislature when offering a bill the other day to pay his colleagues and himself in gold, stated that "everything is now bringing double, treble or fourble what it brought four years ago."

—The New York Tribune divided among its stockholders $50,000 as the proceeds of four month's business. As the entire original stock of the institution was only $100,000, the dividend was somewhat remarkable.

—There is a young lady who plays on the harp between the parts of a panorama in Philadelphia, who performs Blind Tom's feat of executing three airs at the same time—singing one and playing two. Her name is Miss Georgia Dean Spaulding.

—A New York merchant recovered $1,000 from a telegraph company because a despatch sent by him read, "keep manufacturing," a certain article, instead of "stop manufacturing," as he wrote it.

—Benjamin F. Taylor, a clerk in the Cleveland, Ohio post office, has been arrested for robbing the mail, and has confessed his guilt.

—Some years since, Baron Liebig, after many experiments, discovered a plan for making an "extract of meat," by which its bulk, nourishment for nourishment, was reduced one thirtieth. His plan was tried on the continent, and at length taken up by a German settler in Uruguay, and a factory established at Frey Bentos. This establishment, which is to be greatly extended, exports about 4,000 pounds of the preparation every year, which can be purchased for 16 cents per pound. One pound will make soup for 138 men, and we are told on excellent authority that it is now being used in several English hospitals, with the best results. The soup, though not always nice, great care being required in its manufacture, is vastly superior in nourishing qualities to the best beef tea, and from its comparative cheapness, will probably supersede it.

—A negro 111 years old, died at St. Albans, Vt., last week.

—In the case of a deed of trust mortgage of the Great Western Railway for three million dollars, held by a trustee, the Internal Revenue Commissioner has decided that stamps must be affixed. The stamps will amount in value to thirty thousand dollars.

—The Wisconsin eagle, "Old Abe," escaped from confinement last Saturday, and flew off, alighting on a high tree. He was finally coaxed back.

—House rents are enormous in New York. A house on Union square, (old fashioned style not very remarkable for anything,) rented for $1,000 per month—$12,000 per annum—about half of the salary of the president of the United States. Several others are advertised for rent at from $1,000 to $500 per month.

—Near Bedford, England, is a little village church, where the lord of the manor has a private box or apartment overlooking the chancel. A little flight of steps outside the church leads to the double door of this secluded oratory, which is furnished with a fireplace and sundry comfortable chairs and footstools. The proprietor is a devout man and never misses morning service. When the service commences he opens the sash window, which is exactly opposite the reading desk, and behaves with the strictest decorum until the prayers and psalm immediately before the sermon are sung to the end. Then, just as the minister enters the pulpit, he shut down the sash and devotes himself to reading the letters by the morning post, which have in the meanwhile been brought to him by his servant.

—The safe in the counting-room of Wm. T. Richardson, coal dealer at Cambridge, Mass., was blown open recently, and robbed of seven dollars in currency and $30,000 in promissory notes, payment upon which has since been stopped. The explosion was of such power that it woke the residents of houses in the vicinity, some of whom aver that it made the buildings shake; yet the robbers finished their work and got off with their, to them, valueless booty.

—It has been ordered at Moscow that, in all public buildings, the doors of the main entrance shall open outward, instead of inward, as hitherto. The reason of this arrangement is to enable people to have free egress in the event of any accident or panic occurring.

It weighed nearly one hundred pounds. Several years ago, a tusk of nearly the same dimensions, was found near the same place, and is now in the possession of Dr John Sloan of New Albany. In taking it out of the ground, the tusk was broken into several pieces, the ivory having become very much softened.

—The farmers of California are turning their attention to the culture of cotton. Don Jose Rubis of Angelos county, has ginned 250,000 pounds of the fabric this year Matthew Keller, a rich and extensive wine grower of the same county, raised 125 acres of first-rate cotton this year.

Incidents and Accidents.

A woman in Pennsylvania recently exploded a kerosene lamp by blowing down the chimney. The report was like a musket, and the careless woman, Mrs. Mathews, narrowly escaped death A portion of the lamp was thrown with great violence against one of her eyes, and the brass neck of the lamp within which the chimney was set, was blown into many pieces.

Mrs. Eliza Alison, aged sixty-seven years, in Avon, Rock county, Wis., while watching with a sick child, got asleep sitting too near the stove, her clothes took fire and burned completely off her body up to her waist. She was terribly burned, the flesh being fairly roasted off the bones of her limbs. She survived until next day when death put an end to her terrible sufferings.

A man in Providence, R. I., recently deposited in an unused stove $1,000 for safe keeping. A cold snap coming on while he was out of town, his house-keeper built a fire in the stove and the hard earnings of years were in a moment reduced to ashes.

Mrs. Bonner, a resident of Erie, Pa., was so shockingly burned, last week by the accidental overturning of a kerosene lamp, that she died in great agony.

Among the death recently registered in London was that of an infant from a splinter of wood, swallowed accidentally in a little sugar, causing perforation of the bowels.

A man passing through a mill in Lockport, N. Y. was sucked in and buried under twenty feet of grain, being smothered before he could be removed.

Two children, named Antoine Morle, aged five years, and Hervaise Morin, three years of age residing with father at Wellington Bridge, near Montreal, were recently scalded to death by the upsetting of a pot of boiling water. The children were sleeping beside the stove, when a man came into the house drunk, and while attempting to light his pipe upset the stove and a large pot of boiling water upon the children.

A St. Louis lady's hoops caught on the steps of a street car as she was alighting, and the mishap being unobserved by the driver, his horses were started rapidly and the lady dragged some distance over the stones. Though severely bruised, she was not dangerously injured.

Henry Rover, of Toledo, had a difficulty with his wife, and put a pistol in his mouth and fired it off. He never knew what happened after he pulled the trigger.

A man near Lansing, Iowa, got married and then hung himself.

The Bloomington, (Ill.) Pantagraph says that W. H. Lawrence, formerly a compositor in that office, fell head first into a well, about sxty feet deep on Friday evening and was taken out but little hurt.

On Thursday, a freight train on the Toledo Wabash and Great Western railroad was thrown off the track at Island Grove station. The locomotive and several cars were smashed; the engineer, David Johnson, was killed; and the fireman, Mr. J.'s brother was seriously injured.

Dr. Chambers, of Kingston, N. Y., was beset by two stout highwaymen in a lonely part of the road a few nights since and his money demanded. The doctor said, "Well, if I must give up my money I had better do it." So he quietly took off his glove, and, putting his hand into his side-pocket, he drew out—not his pocket-book—but a neat revolver, and bringing it to bear in an instant, he shot one of the robbers dead. The other other ruffian then fired at the doctor, but the ball went harmlessly through his hat. The doctor then took his turn again, and wounded the fellow severely. He then rode back to Kingston and made known the facts, but, on returning, the wounded man had escaped.

PERSONAL.

JOHN STUART MILL will be, in all probability, appointed to succeed Lord Palmerston as rector of the University of Glasgow, though it is likely that the state of his health and his philosophical labors may not permit him to attend to the duties of the office.

ONE of the best things of the season is that of Bishop Simpson, who has declared in favor of paying the rebel war debt when it becomes due, viz: after "the independence of the Confederate States shall have been secured."

THE reception of Gen. Grant at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, in New York, on Monday, the 20th, was a brilliant affair, some 2,000 guests being present. Gen. Grant made a speech of the usual length.

SIDNEY SMITH said of Lord Brougham that he prepared himself for his parliamentary campaign "by living on raw beef, drinking oil of vitriol, and spending his spare time playing with the tigers in the Zoological gardens."

IT is said that Alfred Tennyson has given two private readings, at a guinea a ticket, full dress, and only the invited admitted. His two entertainments netted him three hundred and eighty odd pounds sterling—about seventeen hundred dollars. He once wrote a poem for George Smith, of the Cornhill Magazine, at a guinea a word. He has also had an American indicted who, in reverence for the poet, climbed into Tennyson's garden and broke a twig for a keepsake.

THE Rt. Rev. Dr. Hawks, a North Carolinian by birth, and supposed to have, like the late Hon. John B. Floyd and other partisans of secession, the royal blood of Pocahontas flowing in his veins, has lately returned to New York from a protracted visit to Virginia. Though his long connection with Calvary church came to a close during the war in consequence of the reverend gentleman's rebel proclivities, he again found auditors on Sunday week in the University chapel on Washington square.

THE Round Table strongly suspects that Mr. P. T. Barnum did not write the book on the "Humbugs of the World," which bears his name as author, and challenges Mr. Barnum to make affidavit to the authorship of each chapter in the book.

BRIGHAM YOUNG has had a new "revelation." He says it is "the will of God that the sisters should make their own bonnets and hats for themselves and their families, from straw and other materials raised in the Utah mountains." The next "revelation" will probably dictate the style in which they are to be made and worn. It is said that Brigham Young has a large lot of rye straw "for sale in lots to suit purchasers," which perhaps accounts for the straw hat revelation.

D. W. Ya[illegible] the historicus of the London Times, is about to publish a letter to the President of the United States entitled, "The Neutrality of England Vindicated."

THE oldest pastor in Massachusetts is the Rev. Dr. Emerson, of Salem, who has been settled over the same parish for more than sixty years, and is now more than ninety years of age. He is tall, has a full beard and hair as white as wool, and is in good health. He attends the church, and usually pronounces the benediction at the close of the services.

P. T. BARNUM, in the book on humbugs, tells a good story of the "Retired physician whose sands of life have nearly run out." Everybody, now, knows the humbug, and that "Old Sands" is a brisk young fellow who has made a a fortune out of his impudence. Some time ago some benevolent friend was so much distressed about the feebleness of "Old Sands of Life" as to send him one day a large parcel by express, marked "C. O. D," and costing quite a figure. "Old Sands" on opening the parcel found half a bushel of excellent sand.

IT is stated that Robert Heller, the magician, whose real name is Palmer, has recently fallen heir to a large fortune in England.

PRESIDENT NOTT, of Union College, the semi-centennial celebration of whose anniversary in that distinguished position took place in 1854, and who is now in his 92d year, is rapidly declining in health, though he still has the enjoyment of his mental faculties and of his characteristic cheerfulness and serenity of disposition.

PAUL JULIEN, known in New York, a few years since, as the "wonderful youthful violinist," is playing at a third rate theatre in Paris, and, it is reported, is rapidly retrograding in his professional career, as well as in the social career.

THE Detroit Young Men's Society offered the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher $3,000 for a course of six lectures, he to select his own time. The offer, unprecedently large as it was, was declined by Mr. Beecher, with thanks for its liberality.

CARDINAL WISEMAN'S memory is to be perpetuated among Roman Catholics in England on a colossal scale by the construction of a cathedral of unparalleled magnificence, for which nearly twenty thousand pounds has already been collected.

IT is stated that when the dean of Westminster pronounced the words "dust to dust, ashes to ashes" over the grave of Lord Palmerston, the chief mourner, as a last precious offering to the dead, threw into the grave several diamond and gold rings.

THE Hon. Thomas Corwin, lately United States minister to Mexico, being in New York, was lately introduced to one of the English railway magnates recently traveling in this country as being an Ohioan. This term evidently mis-led John Bull, who looked for a moment a good deal puzzled; however his face suddenly brightened, and seizing the hand of Mr. Corwin, he expressed his happiness in making his acquaintance, then kindly inquired whether his tribe were at peace with the whites!—Mr. Corwin's complexion being rather Indian.

THE most exciting spectacle in Paris on the 30th of October, was the embalmed body the French Dick Turpin, Cartouche. This famous thief was sentenced in 1712 to be broken on the wheel. One of his jailors rendered him a friendly service by strangling him with a silken cord. The executioner chose to consider the corpse his perquisite and drew the town to the ghastly show of the remains on the payment of two sous. But when decay had set its mark upon it, the doctors to whom it was delivered for dissection, thought it would be a good speculation to embalm it, and showed it thus refreshed at ten sous. They left the body to Professor Ballouref who presented it to the Atheneum, whence it was stolen and was sold the other day to the present proprietor for ten thousand francs or four hundred pounds.

MRS. LINCOLN has ordered in Zweikau, Germany, a monument for the grave of her lamented husband the President. It is cut out of serpentine stone of an obscure green color, in the form of a large die, and bears the simple inscription, "Abraham Lincoln." In the middle of October it was to be forwarded by rail to Bremen, from whence it was to be shipped to this country The quarries of Zweikau are celebrated for their stones.

Two operatives were discussing the subject of a new grave-yard in Scotland, when one of them expressed his aversion to it in the remark, "I'd rather dee than be buried in sic a place!" With an equal disregard to the logic of facts, his companion, who held an exactly opposite opinion of the cemetery retorted, "well, if I'm spared in life and health, I'll gang nowhere else!"

TO DESTROY WEEDS.—Some say that the quickest way to destroy "weeds," is to marry a widow. It is no doubt a most delightful species of husbandry."

National Nicknames.

The following are the nicknames of the different States, which we find in an exchange. The origin of many of them would be an interesting study for the curious in such matters:

A SURPRISE TO A WOOD THIEF.—A gentleman living in Terre Haute, whose stove wood melted away faster than was warranted by the mildness of the weather, charged a fine-looking stick with a few ounces of powder, and left it on top of the pile. The Express thus relates the sequel:

"Wednesday forenoon, an explosion was heard in a house near by and a kitchen window was spared no panes. On going to the spot, a sight might have been seen. The stove had joined a peace conference, a kettle of pork and cabbage shot up through the roof like an arrow. A dish of apples stewing on the stove, gave the ceiling the appearance of a map of California. A cat that was sleeping under the stove, went through the broken window, as though she was after the devil or a doctor. The cat has not been heard from since but a smell of burnt hair pervades that house very thoroughly. A flat-iron was hoisted into a pan of dough, a chair lost three legs, the wood-box looks sick, while the roof of the house resembles a bursted apple dumpling."

—Sir Henry Rawlinson lately declared in a lecture to some English mechanics, that the favorite amusement of little boys in Bagdad, is to get on the backs of ostriches and run races, and the birds would stretch out their necks and enjoy the thing as much as an English race horse would.

Telegraphic Charges.

It is about time that something was done to popularize the telegraph. The prices charged are perfectly outrageous. On the continent of Europe, a man can send a message across the whole breadth of France for a single franc, (twenty cents) while the shortest dispatch from Albany to New York, costs fifty cents. There is no excuse for this. It is the most profitable business in the country. All the lines are making enormous dividends on a capital three, five, ten times the cost of the lines. There is no reason why the public should pay such an enormous price for its service. The cost of working a telegraph is very small compared with a railroad or anything else, yet the charges are proportionately higher. This matter is beginning to attract public attention, and will attract more, unless a remedy be speedily applied.—New York Times.

SOMEBODY'S SON.

[These capital lines were composed by Mr. Samuel D. Moses, of Tennessee, for the Gallatin (Tenn) Courier in the spring of 1860.]

Somebody's son was out last night,
Brushing about the town;
And, if I mistake not, he was tight—
"Tight as a Derby clown."

I know he's considered a moral youth,
Above suspicion—but that
Is no reason—to tell the truth
He hadn't a "brick in his hat."

Daylight morality often takes
Strange fancies into its head,
And "plays the d—l," or "jumps up snakes,"
While the public eye is in bed.

"My son can't dance," somebody said,
"For never a lesson took he—"
But he danced last night while you were in bed,
And Twilight was there to see.

You may call it dancing or not, as you feel,
Though for half an hour or more,
He danced or jigged a "tangle-foot reel,"
In front of my office door.

"My son can't sing," somebody swears,
But he sung last night, I know
As rough a song as a demon dares
To sing in the regions below.

"My son don't imbibe," somebody thinks.
Well, maybe he don't—but then,
That he acts very much like one who drinks,
Can be proved by a hundred men.

Yet something was tight—yes drunk—last night,
So drunk it could hardly crawl—
Perhaps 'twas the brim of a crownless hat.
That I found by my garden wall.

For fear I am wrong and somebody's right,
My hasty words I recall,
And say that the thing I saw last night,
Was nobody's son—that's all.

MILDRED GRANT.

CHAPTER I.

"And if they order you to give me up, Mildred, what will you do?"

The scene was a cozy and rather handsome room in an English country house. The walls were lined with books, and a table, littered with dictionaries and grammars, stood in a recess between the bow-windows. Outside were to be seen the gay tints of a pleasant flower-garden, and the bright spring sunshine, streaming into the room, lighted up even the heavy damask window-curtains and the dark leather arm-chair drawn up to the hearth. In this chair sat a tall, spare man of about twenty-seven, whose closely-shaven and rather thin face wore a somewhat stern look, belied by a pleasant voice and a kindly genial smile. A pair of thinly-mounted short-sighted spectacles made him look older than he really was, but behind them twinkled a pair of remarkably handsome gray eyes. A girl of seventeen was standing on the rug before the fire, her bright hair tumbled rather untidily about her face, and the little fingers somewhat daubed with ink, held a German grammar, as if she had come to task her master's help in the matter of the half-written exercise lying on the table.

Every one who visited the Royal Academy in 1862 remembers Mr. Millais' beautiful "Trust me." Mildred Grant might have been taken for the girl in that picture; she was so like her as to render further description unnecessary.

"And if they order you to give me up, Mildred, what will you do?"

He asked the question, but he probably needed no answer, and Mildred gave none, except such as might be conveyed by a shy look from under her eyelids, but she came close up to the big chair, and, standing by the side of it, laid her hand on the arm. A larger hand covered it instantly and Mr. Reeve looked up into her eyes.

"And you really think you have courage to hold out? Four years, Mildred; it is a long time. Poor child, you have a good deal to go through, but how to help it ——. I never felt so inclined to grumble at my position."

"Really?" she questioned with a gleam of a smile, then, changing her tone, "But don't you think there is a little chance of their consenting now?"

"Dearest childie, no! When you say that sort of thing, it almost makes me feel as if I had taken a wrong advantage of your ignorance of the world. No, Milly, if you ever belong to me, it can only be when you are twenty-one, and your own mistress, and in all the time till then I shall never be allowed to see you. Heigh-ho! But still," he added, as if talking to himself, "it wouldn't be right, it wouldn't be honorable, to keep them in ignorance. No, it must be told to-night, coute que coute."

He lapsed into silence, but presently began again. Mildred had left her position by his chair, and seated herself on a footstool before the fire.

"People would say I was talking nensonse, but I really don't think it will be such a very bad thing for you after all. I know you love me, and I don't believe you ever could love any one else so well." Her lips formed "never," but the sound was scarcely audible. "And you see, poor as I am, I believe I shall always be able to maintain myself by teaching or writing. Perhaps I could get on the staff of one of the newspapers, and you will have money enough to make you rich under any circumstances."

Mildred veered round upon her footstool, and put her two hands clasped together upon his knee.

"I don't believe you care for me a bit, or you wouldn't say such unkind things on purpose to vex me. Such nonsense, too," she went on, with the pretty pettishness of a child; and, indeed, she looked little more; "as if when we—I mean some day—everything I have won't be yours, your very own, and not mine at all. And I'm so prond sometimes when I think it will make a difference to you. And I want you to do me a great, great favor. You won't like it, I know, but you must promise not to scold me just this once," and she looked at him with pleading eyes.

He did not seem much inclined to to be angry.

"What is it, Milly?"

"But promise me you'll do it?"

"That's what you used to ask me when you were a little bit of a child; but I must hear what this wonderful favor is, first. I don't altogether trust you in these sort of things."

"Well, but you must do it. Why don't you say it for me? It is so hard to get out, and you know what I mean."

She hid her face in her hands that were still on his knee, and went on.

"I mean if—if you have to leave Chaley, you may be a long time before you get work that will suit you, and I've more money than I know what to do with, even now, and if you would only take a little—only a little—and spend it for me, it would make me so very, very happy." And, on the verge of crying, she put on his knee a little purse, netted with bright silk and beads, in which lay bank notes to the amount of £100. He opened and looked at them with a moved expression. For a second he did not speak, then he took them out, and tucked them into her hand, shutting it tightly with his own.

"Milly, I cannot do it," he said, "my darling, I'll keep the purse as long as I live, but you must not ask the other. I could not speak openly and fairly to your guardian if I had touched it—Mildred, I cannot."

She said no more, but rose and stood looking at the fire with a sorrowful face. Presently he roused himself, and, looking at his watch, said:

"Put away your book, childie, and we will have a last walk together; they need not grudge us that, at all events."

She obeyed in silence, and methodically tidied the room.

"Come here, Mildred," he said, when she had done, and putting his arm around her, he whispered: "You must not take it to heart that I could not do what you asked me. When you think it over you will see I was right; but there is one bit of gold you may give me, and there it is," he added, gently touching her bright hair. "Now go and get ready. God bless you, darling," and he bent down and kissed her lips.

The next day the story had been told, and had met with the reception Mr. Reeve expected. That he, gentleman born and bred though he was, should have ventured to make love to Mildred Grant, the half-sister of the boy to whom he was tutor, was a crime of such magnitude as never to have been imagined or provided against by her mother, Mrs. Carlton. No words could express her indignation and dismay, and few were wasted in the attempt. Mildred had pleaded a headache and gone to bed immediately after dinner, and on the news of Mr. Reeve's presumption being communicated to Mrs. Carlton, that lady felt herself totally uncapable of doing justice to her feelings, that she spared her daughter for that night an interview which Mildred had exceedingly dreaded. But Mr. Carlton, Mildred's step-father and guardian, was a sensible man, and withal a gentleman, and although he disliked the idea of the marriage as much as his wife could do, yet he did not refuse to meet Mr. Reeve upon equal terms, and was willing to waive the breach of confidence on which his wife insisted so strongly, in consideration of their own imprudence in having allowed Mildred to be so much with her brother's tutor. But he represented frankly to Mr. Reeve that if he remained in the house long enough to see Mrs. Carlton again he would not be safe from insult, and appealed to him as a man of honor—insisting at the same time on the fact of Mildred's being a great heiress—to give his promise not to attempt to communicate in any way with her until she should be of age. Appealed to in this way, Mr. Reeve felt that he could not do otherwise than assent. Perhaps he had some faint hope of an opposition violent and unreasonable enough to justify him in refusing all terms; as it was, however, he gave the required promise with a heavy heart, subjoining the words "after to-morrow," though he scarcely hoped to be allowed to take leave of Mildred.

The dog-cart was at the door at six o'clock next morning to convey him to the station, and he was passing through the hall, when a soft whisper reached him through the green baized door of the schoolroom, "Mr. Reeve!" He turned back, and Mildred slipped into his hand a bit of that gold. He took her in his arms for a moment and kissed her, as he did so she whispered, "In four years!" "In four years, my darling, on your birthday, you shall hear from me. God bless and keep you," and he was gone before she had time to answer. How Mildred loved that man!

In spite of what he had said, when Edward Reeve reached London it was to prepare for a sharp struggle with poverty. During the few years that had elapsed since he left the University, he had been charged with the maintenance of his mother and in part with that of his sister, and although he had been recently relieved of that burden by the death of the one and the marriage of the other, yet he had very little cash wherewith to fill Mildred's purse. He arrived at King's Cross station at noon, thoroughly tired, for he had been up nearly all night. The first thing he did after securing a very small lodging (Oh, Mildred, if you could have seen it!) was to go to bed, and to sleep, and when he awoke, to his great astonishment it was six o'clock in the afternoon. His landlady, having satisfied herself by various peeps, that he had not disgraced her lodgings by hiring them for suicidal purposes, had prepared some mutton chops, to which he sat down with a good appetite. Afterwards he opened his desk and looked over a manuscript volume hidden there; no, he would not take another situation as tutor, he would give lessons if he could find pupils, and, if necessary, he would dine upon bread and cheese, but he would devote himself to his literary work, and strive to earn for himself a name that even Mildred's friends should not be ashamed to have her bear. He lighted his pipe upon this determination, and actually awoke faithful to it the next morning, a great thing to say for human resolution.

Four years had nearly passed. It was October, and the following Christmas eve would be Mildred's twenty-first birthday. Mr. Reeve sat by the fire in the identical lodging he had taken on first arriving in London. As he expected, he had seen nothing of the Carlton family. They did not come to town, and he was debarred by his promise from seeking intercourse with Mildred. Now and then he read Miss Grant's name as having been present at such and such a county ball or archery meeting, and his trust in her was so implicit that these announcements simply interested him without costing him a pang. Considering Mildred's youth, such confidence may seem strange, but Edward Reeve was so little used to the ways of the world and the ways of women, as to be still, in such matters, as unsophisticated as a boy. He had grown sparer and graver in these years. How hard had been his struggle with poverty he alone knew, but he had fought bravely, and his luck seemed just on the turn. In the first place the book was actually published, and, although as yet it met with no special welcome from the public, it had been very favorably reviewed by several leading periodicals. One of these critiques he was now about, pipe in mouth, to read. He felt very proud and glad, and as he took the paper in his hand he fancied how Mildred might be reading it, with tears of pleasure in her bright eyes, perhaps at that very time. He toyed for a minute or two with his impatience, glancing up and down the paper; suddenly he changed color, a marriage announcement caught his eye:

"On the 15th instant, at the Parish Church, Chaley Bridge, Yorkshire, Sir Edward Lifford, Baronet, to Mildred, only daughter of the late Richard Grant, Esq., of Chaley Hall."

A mist passed across Edward Reeve's sight, his face was very white, and he sat quite motionless. Presently he quietly laid aside the paper, and shielded his eyes with his hand; a low "God help me!" escaped from his lips; had it been a shriek it would not have told more plainly of acute pain. He sat so, in thought or prayer, or perhaps only in suffering, for about half an hour; then he rose and fetched his desk. He took out first a little paper packet, opened it, and let Mildred's bright hair curl round his finger. If he had put his thoughts into words he would have said that she who had been the star of his life was indeed too bright for him, that was perhaps well for her that she had been untrue. He raised the hair for an instant to his lips, and then dropped it gently into the fire, where the flames sprung up crackling to meet it, next he burnt the few scraps he had of her writing, and lastly opened his blotting-book and wrote as follows:

DEAR SIR—I have reconsidered my decision, and if you will allow me to change my mind, I shall be happy to accompany your son to Pau for the winter, and prepare him for Oxford. I can be ready to start any day next week that may suit you.

I am, dear sir, yours truly, EDWARD REEVE.

The note was finished and Edward Reeve went out and posted it. Returning, he smoked so energetically that the room was in a cloud, and then he went to bed and drew the clothes over his head, and cried like a child.

CHAPTER II.

"Well, Mr. Reeve, I've found out who those people are, and what's more, I've seen them."

The speaker, a lad of seventeen, with a frank English face, a delicate skin, now suffused with color, and curly hair, met and joined his tutor, Edward Reeve, as he turned into the Place Royal, Pau, on his way to the Hotel de France. They did not live there, but came every day from their lodgings to dine at the table d'hote for the sake of sociability. Gilbert Blake's curiosity had been aroused by a telegram received by Monsieur Gardere, ordering rooms for an English family who would arrive at Pau, in the afternoon, and lacking any other object for a walk he strolled through the park to the station to meet the only train from Paris, and as it seems, had his curiosity gratified by a sight of the party.

"They're bride and bridegroom honeymooning, Mr. Reeve—the courier told me. At least not quite honeymooning, I suppose, for the mother's with them, and I heard something about a step-father coming."

"You'll want a dozen mothers-in-law to look after you and your wife when your time comes for honeymooning, if you go on as you are now," said Mr. Reeve jokingly; "as I live, I believe you've been playing at Quille in your great coat."

"No, I haven't," laughed the boy; "but I will tell you what I did do. I meant to have come back in the 'bus, but it was full, so I ran all the way and got back in time to see them get out. The bride was so pretty, and they are not going to stay, so it was my only way to make sure of having another look at her, but I've not had time to cool yet."

"The most idiotic proceeding," began Mr. Reeve, looking at the boy's crimson forehead, then checking himself as if he thought he was lecturing, he added, "better not do it again, Gilbert; if you are so imprudent you will do away with all the good of Pau, and you are so well now."

Gilbert might perhaps have blushed, but he could not grow redder than he already was; instead, he tried to change the subject. "The bride is really a stunner. Such eyes and such hair. Her mother, if she is her mother, is quite a young woman, not above forty, I should think. I didn't hear her name, the courier only said, 'Sir Edward and Lady Lifford.'"

"Sir who?" Mr. Reeve turned to him with awakened interest.

"Oh! I forgot to tell you, they're Sir Edward and Lady Lifford on their wedding tour. He is to dine at the table-d'hote to-night; the ladies said they would not come down."

Mr. Reeve turned away. He felt sick at heart. Why should they, of all people in the world, have crossed his path? Mildred—he thought bitterly—had driven him out of England, and now she must needs pursue him here. Before he had recovered himself the table-d'hote bell rang, and he turned in with Gilbert and took his place at dinner. His neighbor at the table, a good-humored Frenchman, with whom he had struck up an intimacy, found his efforts at conversation responded to very feebly on this evening, and soon noticed that his companion's eyes were fixed on a tall, rather heavy-looking Englishman of about sixty-five, who sat opposite, making poor work of the thin soup and greasy fish placed before him. Edward Reeve knew the faces at the table well enough to be sure who the stranger must be. That Mildred's husband! To think of her, in her brightness and beauty, sacrificed to a man old enough to be her grandfather! To think of her consenting to such a sacrifice on the very eve of liberty! Edward Reeve recollected bitterly all her loving words to him. When he burnt her hair he made a fond foolish excuse to himself for not destroying the little purse, by saying that he had promised her to keep it always, but now he thought he would burn it as soon as he reached his room. What had it been but the frail token of a fickle love? Lady Lifford might be drinking her tea up-stairs, but Mildred—his Mildred—with her pure love and child-like faith, could never exist again, if indeed she ever had existed except in his own fancy.

When dinner was over Sir Edward rose, and, coming round to Gilbert, touched him on the shoulder.

"I beg your pardon, but I fancy you are a son of my old friend, Gilbert Blake. Do you know if your father was at Christ Church in '20 and '21?"

Gilbert colored and answered, and the next moment he had accepted Sir Edward's invitation to spend the evening in his rooms. Almost before Mr. Reeve had caught the purport of the conversation, he found himself included in the invitation; which, however he declined, pleading a bad headache, and walked home to his rooms, chafing inwardly. A headache! The Liffords were only passing through Pau, and that headache should last until they were fairly gone; he could not, no, he would not, meet Lady Lifford. He tried, with indifferent success, to devote himself to his books till Gilbert came home, and then refrained from all questions as to how the evening had been spent. It was rather a relief that Gilbert was disposed to be a great deal less communicative than usual. He volunteered no account of his visit, and a few words were exchanged before the two gentlemen parted for the night.

Next morning, as Mr. Reeve was sitting doggedly down to his books immediately after breakfast—Gilbert's studies did not begin till later in the day—a little pink note was put into his hand. The contents were as follows:

"HOTEL DE FRANCE, Tuesday.

"DEAR MR. REEVE—If you can spare the time it would be very kind of you to call here to-day between 11 and 1 o'clock. I have several things to say to you, and I greatly wish to see you.

"Yours very truly,
"MILDRED LIFFORD."

Edward Reeve groaned in spirit. Was it not enough for Mildred to have wasted the best years of his life, that she must persecute him so? Or was she in trouble, and some shadow of her old trust made her send for him in her distress? It did not signify, in either case he must obey her summons, for he could not confess himself too weak to bear to see her.

At half-past eleven he presented himself at the door of the Hotel de France and asked for Lady Lifford. Miladi was at home, Monsieur would find her apartments au premier, if he would give himself the trouble to walk up stairs. The apartment door was opened by an English lady's-maid who showed him into the sitting room, and departed without announcing him, closing the door softly behind her.

On a low chair before the fire, sat Mildred reading. She had not heard him enter and for a moment he watched her in silence. The firelight was gleaming over her hair, as bright and luxuriant as ever, but he could see that the hand held up to shade her face, was paler than it used to be, and he fancied that the lines of her mouth had a look of sadness that they were strangers to on that day four years ago—remembered ah! how vividly—when she had sat at his feet in the school-room at Chaley Hall.

Awkwardly enough he advanced towards the fire-place, but at the first step, Mildred looked up, and the old beautiful eyes met his. She colored violently as she rose from her seat, held out her hand and tried to speak, but the effort was too great, she hid her face in her hands and burst into tears.

A great lump stuck in Edward Reeve's throat, as he stood looking at her quite unmanned, and with all his sternness melted.

"Tell me anything you like," he said gently; "don't grieve so, I did not come here to blame you."

But Mildred did not hear; she was struggling with her sobs. "I beg your pardon," she at last managed to gasp out. "It is so foolish, but I have been ill and unhappy." All at once she turned so pale that he thought she was going to faint. Instinctively he put out his arm so support her; perhaps she mistook the gesture. She turned toward him, gave one look up to the familiar face with its expression of unchanged tenderness, and burst out crying again with her head on his breast.

For once in Edward Reeve's life he lost all power of self control. Away went every though of what was due to her and to himself—away went prudence—swallowed up in his great grief and love for her. "Mildred, Mildred!" he cried with an exceeding bitter cry, and clasping her to his heart he showered down kisses upon her face. For one instant he held her in that position, and the next the door opened, and Sir Edward Lifford walked innocently into the room.

Mr. Reeve released Mildred. The moment of that passion had passed, and shame overcame him at sight of the man he had wronged. But he must shield Mildred if he could, so he advanced towards Sir Edward, a certain dignity of manner concealing his real feelings.

"I dare not ask your forgiveness," he said; "you can hardly think my conduct more reprehensible than I see it to have been. I have been culpably forgetful of my duty, and am deeply sensible of it. All I can venture to ask of you, Sir Edward, is to let your just anger fall upon me, and not on your wife."

"Upon my wife?" repeated Sir Edward, opening his honest eyes very wide, and looking curiously peaceable. "What in the world has Lady Lifford to do with it? Do you suppose, young man, that I make her responsible for the freaks and follies of any young lady that she has charge of?"

Unbounded astonishment took possession of Mr. Reeve's face; he looked at Mildred almost doubting his own sense of hearing.

"Is not she—do you mean—is not this Lady Lifford?" he stammered at last in dire confusion.

"No! here is Lady Lifford if you please" said a cheery voice, and a blooming woman, fat, fair and forty, with the rosiest cheeks and the merriest smile, walked into the room.

"Mr. Reeve, what have you been saying to distress Miss Grant so?"

"My dear, perhaps you can understand what Mr. Reeve means, be hanged if I can" said Sir Edward sitting down stolidly upon an ottoman.

But Edward Reeve had turned again to Mildred and drawn her into his arms before them all. "My darling, tell me only one thing," he whispered, "do you belong to me still?"

And Lady Lifford laid hands on Sir Edward, and conveyed him and herself out of the room, and left them together.

"And so you forgive my little plot do you Mr. Reeve?" said Lady Lifford an hour afterward, when they were all seated at luncheon. Mr. Reeve was beaming. His eyes glittered through his spectacles with their old twinkle, and the excitement had wrought up his spirits to a most unwonted pitch.

"I am ready to forgive your ladyship anything," he replied. "But I confess that a great deal has passed that is beyond my comprehension."

"Your wits are wool-gathering, I am afraid; but here comes your pupil to look after his tutor. Perhaps he may enlighten you."

Gilbert's handsome face showed itself at the door. With laughing eyes and outstretched hands, he walked up to his tutor.

"May I congratulate you Mr. Reeve? I was not far wrong when I was telling Lady Lifford that I thought you were still wearing the willow for a certain young lady you had been engaged to. (That's why he tyrannized over me so)" he added in a comic aside to Lady Lifford.

"Wrong, no! but how in the word did you know anything about it?"

"Sir, you have a sister, I have a mother, they know each other," said Gilbert dramatically.

"Come, come," said Lady Lifford; "you talk as if I had nothing to do with it. I am not going to let you have all the credit for this happy denouement."

"No!" said Gilbert, folding his hands resignedly. "I knew no names, and little thought in the innocence of my heart when I came up last night with Sir Edward, that I was being led into a plot which would end in my being left tutorless and probably plucked."

"Be quiet, sir, and let me tell my story to Mr. Reeve," said Lady Lifford, good humoredly. "I had no idea of taking my niece abroad, to try what change of climate would do for her, without knowing what the complaint was that came upon her so queerly last Christmas-day. So by degrees I persuaded her to confide in me, and I have been on the lookout for you since. When I heard what Gilbert (Mr. Blake, I beg your pardon—I know your father so well in old days), what Gilbert told me, I put two and two together, and it flashed upon my mind all at once that it was my marriage you had heard of and mistaken for Mildred's. My poor brother had quarreled with me years ago about money matters, and his wife never forgave me till the other day, so it is no wonder that you never heard at Chaley Bridge of a Mildred Grant of the last generation, and I thought that you might not know that the Grants had been Richards always from father to son. Gilbert confided in me that he had taken Mildred for me at the station, and described her to you accordingly. So you see it was just irresistible to write you a note just a little more familiar than I should naturally have sent, and to take care that Mildred should be in the drawing-room to receive you. Gilbert was a good boy and held his tongue, and you and Mildred proved yourselves quite equal to the situation.

Lady Lifford made a curtesy to her niece, who between her smiles and her tears and her blushes, presented a very charming picture of confusion.

"Haw haw!" Sir Edward's loud laugh rang through the group. It is doubtful whether he had before had a clear idea of what was going on. "Best joke I ever heard. Thought I was going to call him out for kissing my wife, eh?"

"Allow me to kiss her hand this time in your presence, Sir Edward," said Mr. Reeve with unprecedented gallantry, and suiting the action to the word. He retained her hand in his after raising his head, as he said, "My dear Lady Lifford, you have been a sort of providence to us both. I don't know how I shall ever thank you, but it will take a long time, and—its surely not true that you are going to leave Pau to-morrow?"

"Not we," rejoined Lady Lifford with a merry laugh. "Providence will not desert you as soon as all that. We are only abroad for pleasure. Sir Edward says he likes Pau and I intend to stay for the wedding."

.....A physician once advised Sydney Smith to take a walk upon an empty stomach.

"Whose stomach?" he asked.

.....A preacher whose text led him to speak of the prophet Jonah, among other things, said: "I am of the opinion Jonah was an old man, neither smoking or chewing, from the fact that the fish retained him so long in his stomach. If the fish had swallowed the house we are worshiping in, he would no doubt have vomited himself to death."

.....The Irish Fenians have committed a gross absurdity in their illegal drilling. The Fenian "circles" have been endeavoring to form themselves into squares.

.....A negro who had learned to read, wishing to give an idea of it to some of his acquaintances who had never seen a book, said, "Reading is the power of hearing with the eyes instead of the ears.

....."How is it," said a man to his neighbor, "that our parson, the laziest man living, writes these interminable sermons?" "Why," said the other, "probably, after he begins writing, he is too lazy to stop."

....."What a fine head your boy has!" said an admiring friend, "Yes," said the fond father, "he's a chip of the old block—ain't you my boy?" "Yes, father," replied the boy; "teacher said yesterday I was a young blockhead."

.....A chemist was called up at two o'clock the other morning by the ringing of the night-bell. On opening the door he found a damsel, who told him that she was going to a pic-nic that morning and was out of rouge. The impudent druggist turned her off with the assurance that he hadn't in stock as much as would cover a check like her's.

.....Brother G., in times of revivals and protracted meetings, always stepped in and took charge of the singing. He was very fond of that interminable song that began with, "Where, O where, is good old Adam?" and might end with the last man. He had passed through the patriarchs and prophets of the olden time, and the disciples and blessed women of the New Testament, when John the Baptist occurred to him. "Where, O where, is John the Baptist? Safe in the promised land. He went up"—Here brother G. stumbled. He tried it again. "He went up"—but still there was a difficulty in fixing the mode of ascension. At length, with desperate energy, he put it through. "He went up without any head on, safe in the promised land."

Temperance Lectures.

Here are a couple of items, each of them in itself a whole temperance lecture:

In his lecture on peculiar people, Mr. Gough narrated the following incident, which is more thoroughly maudlin and mellow than anything in "Toodles."

Inebriate No. 1—"How bright the moon shines!"

No. 2—"You don't call that the (hic) moon do you? That's the sun."

No. 1—"Tell you its the (hic) moon."

No. 2—"Taint, its (hic) sun,"

No. 1—"Well, less leave (hic) leave matters to the first man we meet."

No. 2—"Greed."

The two then tottered along for a short distance, when they chanced to meet a man in exactly the same condition as themselves. He was immediately treated to the following interrogation:

No. 1—"I say (hic) old feller, we've got into a little 'spute—want yer t'elp us out. My fren here says that's sun (pointing upward to Old Sol who was blazing fiercely down upon them), and I say its (hic) moon. Now, we're going to leave the matter with you. What (hic) is it—sun or moon?"

The person addressed braced himself with considerable difficulty against a lamp-post, and commenced by scrutinizing as well as he could the burning orb overhead, repeating in a meditative tone of voice; Sun—moon—sun (hic)—moon." After a short observation, he exclaimed: "Fact is gen'lmen, I'm a (hic) stranger in these parts, and I can't tell whether its (hic) sun or moon."

WHILE Dr. Carpenter was tarrying at Waterville, he was called upon by a tough old customer of sixty, whose eyes showed plainly that brandy-and-water was no stranger to him, and whose breath corroborated the testimony of his eyes. The doctor examinined him and suggested that ardent spirits might have something to do with his condition.

"Oh, no," said the old fellow, "I don't drink enough to hurt anybody. I take something stimulating when I get up; and then again just before breakfast; then only once at 11 o'clock; and a little dose before and after dinner to help digestion; don't use anything more till four o'clock, and then a little more before and after supper, and before I go to bed."

"That's all?" inquired the doctor.

"Never take anything more unless somebody invites me," said the man.

"Well sir," said the doctor, I think I can cure your eyes, but you must leave off drinking entirely."

"What," said he in amazement, "can't I take just a little?"

"No sir, not a drop. And if you don't leave off, you are liable to become blind."

"Then farewell eyes," said the old toper as he seized his hat and made for the door, evidently afraid that the doctor would prescribe for him before he could get out of the door.

TOM SAYERS, the noted pugilist, is dead.

ALONE BY THE HEARTH.

BY GEORGE ARNOLD.

Here in my snug little fire-lit chamber,
Sit I alone;
And as I gaze on the coals, I remember
Days long agone.

Saddening it is when the night has descended,
Thus to sit here,
Pensively musing on episodes ended
Many a year.

Still in my visions a golden-haired glory
Flits to and fro;
She whom I loved—but 'tis just the old story,
Dead long ago.

'Tis but the wraith of a love; yet I linger
(Thus passion errs),
Foolishly kissing the ring on my finger—
Once it was hers.

Nothing has changed since her spirit departed,
Here in this room—
Save I, who, weary and half broken hearted,
Sit in the gloom.

Loud 'gainst the window the winter rain dashes,
Dreary and cold;
Over the floor the red fire-light flashes,
Just as of old.

Just as of old—but the embers are scattered
Whose ruddy blaze
Flashed o'er the floor where her fairy feet pattered
In other days.

Then her dear voice like a silver chime ringing,
Melted away;
Often these walls have re-echoed her singing;
Now hushed for aye.

Why should love bring nought but sorrow, I wonder?
Everything dies!
Time and death, sooner or later, must sunder
Holiest ties.

Years have rolled by; I am wiser and older—
Wiser, but yet
Not till my heart and its feelings grow colder
Can I forget.

So in my snug little fire-lit chamber
Sit I alone;
And as I gaze in the coals, I remember
Days long agone.

A Cool Operation.

A few years ago, a young gentleman living in this city, went to St Paul, Minnesota, engaged in business, made money and married a lady residing in that city. After he had been married about six months, he prepared to visit Milwaukee in company with his bride. But a few days before he was about to start, he was accidentally killed by a barrel of sugar falling on him from the second story window of a warehouse. The event was duly communicated to his family in this city. This was about two years ago. About three months after, the father of the deceased was startled to see a carriage drive up to his door. A very interesting lady, dressed in mourning, stepped out and introduced herself as the widow of his dead son. Great was the joy of the household at this visit of their beloved son's relict. She said she was going to Rhode Island, and could not resist the opportunity of seeing the parents and relations of her beloved "Willie." This was accompanied by a flood of tears and a "hefty" sigh.

Three weeks passed by, and she had worked herself into the affections of the family. But the hour came for her departure. They exchanged miniatures; the blubbering and lobbering was at its height, when she called the old gentleman to one side, and with great embarassment told him that she had lost her pocket-book on the cars, containing all but a trifle of her funds. She felt a diffidence in making the request, but if she could not apply to the father of "her beloved Willie," to whom could she go? The old man's heart melted, and in a moment his wallet was produced—ten Xs of Uncle Sam's bank were tendered and accepted. She departed—alas! that dear friends should part! Time flew, a few months passed and nothing was heard from "beloved Willie's" relict. The old gentleman became alarmed, and addressed a letter to the father of his son's wife, detailing the circumstances of her visit. An answer came. It stated that the widow of their late son was at home—had not been away, and that from the description given, the woman who personated her was a servant girl who had lived with them, and who had gleaned enough of the history of Willie's family to enable her to play the wife. Fancy the "pheelinks of the old gentleman, when he found out how he had been victimized.—Milwaukee Wisconsin.

Bolting Food.

Bolting flour and bolting doors may be very proper but according to the Round Table bolting food is quite another thing. To this diabolical practice is to be ascribed the lean, scrawny, scraggy, dyspeptic appearance which characterizes so many denizens of the land we love. The following amusing picture of the way an American "woods up" is given by that journal:

The rapidity with which Americans dispatch their meal has always been a marvel to Europeans. And yet it is quite natural. The Englishman or Frenchman repairs to his ordinary to dine, the American rushes to his eating-house or boarding-house to feed. His object is simply to take in fuel to sustain the flame of life, and, like a Mississippi steamboat, he "woods up" as fast as possible. He bolts his food bolus-wise because he does not relish the taste of it. Under a better culinary dispensation he would enjoy his meals; as it is, he endures them.

To the man who knows how to dine, the interior of a New York restaurant of the "immediate dispatch" class presents, between the hours of 1 and 2 o,clock, a most uncomfortable spectacle. Perched literally "cheek by jowl" on high stools, closely wedged together, one sees 20 or 30 men and youths with their heads bent down and their elbows in rapid motion. Viewed from the rear one might suppose them to be weaving or fiddling. Behind them stands another row waiting for vacancies. Every now and then one of the perchers in the front rank slips off his roosting place, whereupon the member of the reserve corps immediately behind him hops into it and gives his order. About two minutes thereafter and the candidate for a flying dinner has his plate of meat slung at him along the greasy marble counter with the singular grace and dexterity characteristic of New York waiters of the impulsive or slam-bang school. The heavy solids disposed of, the flatulent dessert is instantly "thrown in," and in eight minutes from the time he mounted his prandial perch the guest has dined. If one did not feel that the fast feeders at the restaurants were committing slow suicide, their habits would be rather an amusing study.

The Stomach is the great centre which influences the health or the disease of the system—Abused or debilitated by excess indigestion, offensive breath and physical prostration are the natural consequences. Allied to the brain, it is the source of headaches, mental depression nervous complaints and unrefreshing sleep. The liver becomes affected and generates bilious disorders, pains in the side &c. The Bowels sympathize by Costiveness, Diarrhoea and Dysentry. The principal action of these Pills is on the stomach and the liver, lungs, bowels and kidneys participate in their recuperative and regenerative operation

Are two of the most common and virulent disorders prevalent on this continent, to these the Ointment is especially antagonistic its "modus operandi" is first to eradicate the venom and then complete the cure.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Ulcers.

Cases of many years' standing, that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions on the Skin.

Female Complaints.

Whether in the young or old, married or single, at the dawn of Womanhood, or the turn of life, these tonic medicines display so decided an influence that a marked improvement is soon preceptible in the health of the patient. Being a purely vegetable preparation they are safe and reliable remedy for all classes of females in every condition of health and station of life.

Piles and Fistula

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emolient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healing qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

These Bitters are prepared, in pure Boerton Water, from a combination of over twenty different kinds of roots, barks and herbs, which act in perfect concert one with other, prepared from the original formula given by the great chief, Red Jacket, to Dr Chapin, who used them successfully in his practice for many years, and by their use gained a great popularity in the treatment and cure of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Constipation, Sick and Nervous Headache, Fever and Ague, and all diseases arising from a torpid liver or indigestion. Persons suffering from either of these loathsome diseases need only use one bottle of these Bitters, which are perfectly pure and free from all those drugs and poisons usually put up in such popular medicines, and be satisfied of an unsuspecting public. A single trial will convince the most skeptical of its merits, for in the RED JACKET there is virtue which no other Bitters possess.

They strengthen and invigorate the system.
They are unequaled for general debility.
They are a sure cure for dyspepsia.

OUR DOVES.

It is a historical fact that doves were employed as messengers. Noah used them from his solitary ark, and at a later period lovers sent their letters by the same convenience. It must have been a pleasing sensation to the lover to hear the beak of the dove knocking at the window, bringing a letter full of that sweet and soothing assurance so dear to the doubting heart. We also have messages to send to every one, but cannot do it in that romantic way. We must send our messages

IN THE POND.—A few days ago a daughter of Mr. A. Rosacrans, while skating upon the red mill pond broke through the ice and was—very thoroughly "ducked." Luckily the water was quite shallow where she fell in, and she succeeded in getting out without assistance and without any injury save a good soaking.

Dr. Curtis is daily recieving large invoices of New Goods for the Holidays which he offers at very low rates. Go and see his splendid assortment of Pocket Knives &c.

Hiney & Walters have opened a nice stock of fresh groceries in the room formerly occupied by J. H. Wishart where they propose keeping everything usually found in such an establishment. They have also a Bakery in connection and will keep Bread, cakes &c. constantly on hand. Give them a call.

EXAMINATIONS.—The annual examinations of the classes in our Union School will commence on Tuesday Dec. 19th and will continue during the week. The teachers will be happy to give visitors every opportunity to observe the condition of the different departments.

The excellent preparations of Dr. Chapin, by the use of which he gained so great a popularity in the treatment and cure of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Constipation, and Palpitation of the Heart, and all diseases arising from Indigestion and Torpid Liver, was none other than what is now put up under the name of Red Jacket Stomach Bitters.

Isaac Terry will sell at Auction, at his residence, 3 miles east of Pennington's corners, Dec. 22d, 1865, at 10 o'clock, 80 Sheep and other valuable property.

Accidents:

A terrible railroad accident occurred one day last week on the Orange and Alexandria railroad, in which three persons were killed and twenty eight wounded. On Saturday last a disastrous fire took place in New York in which three large cotton warehouses were burned killing seven or eight firemen and involving a loss of two million dollars. Speaking of these auful misfortunes reminds us that it is the duty of every man to insure himself against fire and accident. Duty suggests it—cheapness commends it.—Reason and experience demand it. S. C. STACY.

THIRD RAIL ON THE GREAT WESTERN.—At a semi-annual meeting of the Directors of this road, held in London on the 11th of October, the President of the company announced that the Directors had come to the conclusion that a third rail must be laid down. The estimated cost of such improvement is about $700,000, and it is considered by railway authorities in New York that the cost of laying the third rail would be paid for in three years by the increased traffic of the road. Mr. Swinyard estimates that the increased receipts would repay the cost of the undertaking in eigh years.

The President's message entire will be found in this number of the Herald. It contains a noble exposition of the principles of our government. Singularly frank, and in his glowing sentences truly eloquent there is a charm in this message that takes hold of our hearts and compels us to admit that President Johnson is really a good man,—great in his clear comprehension of the embarrassment of the country and his own position and duties; great in the unquestionable sincerity and truthfulness, clear as chrystal, which stamps the whole document a document worthy of the best men and the age of the Republic.

WINTER.—Old winter has knocked at our door at last. Tho' late in making his appearance he is evidently endeavoring to make up for all delay. The cold north-wester, the rough roads—the blazing fires, the naked streets, the buffaloes and mufflers all proclaim that our autumn days of '65 are gone, never to return. Old heads prophesy a hard winter. Well, let it come, but we would suggest that it bring a little snow along with it.

All persons who have not already subscribed to the Soldiers Monument Fund and wish to do so, will please call on W. Anderson, at the Post Office, or G. W. Ketcham.

Pay Your Taxes.

TREASURER'S OFFICE, Tec. Dec. 4th.

I shall be at my office, at the foundry of E. D. Burlingame & Co. on each Saturday from the 9th of December to and including the second Saturday of January. Those paying their taxes during the above named time only one per cent. fee will be required.

WM. VANCAMP, Town Treasurer.

"CARISTMAS COMES BUT ONCE A YEAR"—Father, Mother, Sister, Brother, Lover—anybody,—go to Moore's and buy a set of Furs to present to somebody. $8000 worth of Mink, Sable, Fitch, Stone Martin, Muskrat, Coney, Beaver, Otter and Squirrel goods—at last year's prices at MOORE'S.

R. C. Moore has returned from New York—having purchased his stock when the market was at the lowest figures which have been reached for six months past and is prepared to offer goods to buyers at the lowest market rates,—there is no prospect of goods being any lower this season—and there is no reason why those in want of Goods should not now buy—there has been a heavy decline in domestics within the last two months,—so that they, who are judges of Goods, cannot fail to see it,—those who have an indistinct idea that goods have become worthless and can be bought for almost nothing, had better wait until they can see their error. Goods are low now and the demand from the South, for Goods, in the month of January next must have the tendency to advance prices again.

For Sale Cheap.—One span of 5 year old bay horses, as sound as a bullet. TINDALL & SLAYTON.

LECTURE.—The second Lecture of the course before the Union Lyceum will be delivered on Friday evening of next week Dec. 22d by Dr. E. O. Hayes, President of Mich. University. His subject will be "The white man in America."

Tecumseh, Dec. 2d, 1865.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK.

Our Canadian neighbors still suffer from the Fenian scare. A few mornings since, the express train from Rochester was overhauled at Suspension Bridge, and the discovery made of a large invoice of revolvers and metallic cartridges packed in carpet bags. On this side, ot Buffalo and Detroit, an equal zeal is manifested in thwarting whiskey smugglers.

The imperial troops in Mexico are being withdrawn from Clihuahua to Vera Cruz which is supposed to indicate a design to send them back to France.

The last volume of the census is out.

Eleven thousand blacks of Washington have petitioned Congress for suffrage. In view of their probable success, those opposed are proposing to throw up the city charter, leaving Congress to govern the city.

About 400 editorials from as many different newspapers have been received at the White House, 99 per cent of which it is said heartily endorse it.

Thirteen prisoners escaped from the Nashville, (Tenn.,) jail on the night of the 8th.

Col. Crane has been sentenced to pay a fine of five thousand dollars.

The troubles in the Fenian camp continue. On the 7th inst. the Senate in session at New York filed articles of impeachment against O'Mahoney, President of the Irish Republic, charging him with perfidy and malfeasance in office. The charges and specifications were served upon him and he was given twenty hours in which to answer. Not paying any attention to the notification, the Senate met and deposed him from office. B. D. Killian, Treasurer, was also deposed for the same reasons.

The Georgia Legislature has ratified the Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery.

Lieut. Moffatt and Jefferson Davis Howell, officers of the late pirate Alabama, arrived at Portland by the Hibernian on the 6th, and were arrested on the eve of starting for Canada.

Four children, composing the family of Richard Gross, living at Raleigh, C. W., were burned to death recently, during the absence of their parents.

The Hibernian, on the 6th inst., brought later intelligence from Europe. Stephens, the Irish Head Centre, has escaped from jail. The cattle plague is on the increase in England. The Fenian excitement continues, and the forts at Dublin are strongly garrisoned. The British government has determined to remonstrate with Spain on the subject of the Spanish blockade of Chilian ports. A fatal malady has broken out among the poultry in France for which no remedy can be found.

Baltimore experienced a most remarkable day on the 4th inst., the weather being as hot as in summer, and the thermometer reaching 108° in the sun.

The Virginia Legislature met on Monday, 4th inst. It is a curious fact that in the House of Delegates, of ninety-six members, with a single exception—that of the delegate from Rockbridge county—every member is an "old line Whig;" while, in the Senate, the exceptions are but three or four, the remainder being all of like party antecedents. The whole delegation elect in Congress and a very large majority of the State and local officers of every grade, were also Whigs. The new Constitution adopted at Alexandria repudiates the rebel war debt, and the Alexandria Legislature has ratified the Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery; and yet it is probable both questions will be discussed and acted upon in Richmond.

The fire-fiend held high carnival in Chicago on Thanksgiving Day. During the day and night, succeeding, there were no less than five fires, one of them consuming five business fronts on Clark street, at the corner of Jackson, together with many outbuildings. But the most remarkable case was that of the burning of the new Free Will Baptist Church, at the corner of Jackson and Peoria streets, West-Side. The building had just been dedicated, and the congregation had been scarcely an hour dismissed when the fire broke out. The Society had not long before lost another church by burning. The loss is about $20,000.

The war between Spain and Chili has had the same effect upon the price of copper as the rebellion South had upon the price of cotton. Copper is now the idol of the day; even gold pales before its gathering grandeur in the eyes of those who have large stocks on hand. The recent advance in Great Britain has been followed here. In less than a week ingot copper advanced from thirty-nine to forty-five cents per pound in most of the Atlantic cities, but it cannot now be purchased at forty-five cents. This, as was expected, has created intense excitement among the copper mining companies, who have advanced their stocks to correspond with the times.

The Constitutional Amendment, abolishing slavery, has passed the Alabama Legislature by a large majority. Twenty-seven States have now passed the amendment.

Hon. Wm. A. Graham has been elected U. S. Senator for the long term by the North Carolina Legislature. He has not yet been pardoned.

On the 3d inst., near Brooksville, Miss., a young man named James Thompson killed his mother, brother, and two sisters, and wounded his father and another sister. The murderer was arrested and taken to Brooksville, where he was hung by the citizens.

At Cario, on the 9th, as an officer of the 2d Wisconsin cavalry was endeavoring to remove a drunken soldier from the top of a car, the train started, and both persons were precipitated to the ground. The soldier's head was cut entirely off, and the officer was severely bruised.

The treasury report of Secretary McCullough is regarded with favor by the country at large. He takes up every topic which concerns our financial interests, and handles each in such a manner as to make it clear to the commonest mind. He says the country must get back to a specie basis and stop inflation, else there will be a collapse at no distant day. Consequently the present enormous amount of currency must be contracted. He opposes the taxing of government securities, and a reduction in the number of articles now taxed for revenue. He opposes any reciprocity treaty with Canada, and shows at length how by the devotion of $200,000,000 annually to that purpose, the entire national debt (calling it in round numbers $3,000,000,000), may be paid up completely in about thirty years. The above are the principal points of the report, except the figures of the debt, which do not differ from those we have lately published.

The Louisiana Legislature, on 6th, elected Randall Hunt as one of the United States Senators from that State; and would probably choose the other Senator on Friday.

The Asia brings later intelligence from Europe. Spain has backed out of the Chilian affair, and ordered the Spanish Admiral to suspend operations. Stephens, the Fenian Head Centre of Ireland, has not yet been captured, although a large reward has been offered for him by the British government. Parliament meets on the 28th of January, and the Queen's speech will be delivered on the 1st of February.

O'Mahony, the President of the Fenian brotherhood denounces the Fenian senate as malcontents. There is also trouble at headquarters, and the president publishes a list of the brethren who are warned off as dishonest.

The President's message and Secretary McCulloch's report have caused an advance in government securities and a decline in gold.

CONGRESSIONAL.—The 39th congress yesterday convened at Washington. The senate was called to order by acting Vice President Foster. Thirty-nine gentlemen responded to the call of the roll. Messrs. Poland, of Vermont, and Stockton, of New Jersey, were sworn into office—a protest being entered in the case of the latter, alleging that he did not receive a constitutional majority of votes. Mr. Wade presented a bill permitting negro suffrage in the District of Columbia. Mr. Sumner introduced a bill to provide for placing colored men on grand juries in the southern states: prescribing an oath to maintain a republican form of government in the states lately in rebellion; to enforce the constitution amendment; to give the right of suffrage to colored men in the District of Columbia, and to amend the constitution relative to congressional representation. He also sent in resolutions declaring the adoption of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and defining the duties of congress toward loyal citizens of the insurrectionary states.

In the house, 175 members answered to their names. The southern claimants were excluded, although an attempt was made to secure the admission of the Tennessee delegation. Mr. Colfax was elected speaker, and the other nominees of the republican caucus were all elected. The reconstruction resolution of the caucus was adopted. Notice was given to renew the grade of general in our army. Tuesday was occupied with the reading of the message and reports.

In the Senate, on Wednesday, the standing committees were announced. The chairmen of the principal ones are as follows; Foreign Affairs, Sumner; Finance, Fessenden; Commerce, Chandler; Manufactures, Sprague; Agricultural, Sherman; Military Affairs, Wilson; Naval Affairs, Grimes; Pensions Lane of Ind.; Judiciary, Trumbull; Claims, Clark; District of Columbia, Dixon; Indian Affairs, Doolittle; Territories, Wade; Pacific Railroad, Howard. A bill was introduced to regulate commerce between the several states. A committee was appointed to cooperate with a committee from the House as to appropriate action in regard to the death of President Lincoln. A resolution was offered, calling for vigorous action against the hostile Indians. The Senate adjourned to Monday.

In the House, bills were introduced for the relief of the widow of President Lincoln; giving wounded soldiers while in government employ, the right to receive pensions; amending the act declaring who shall assume the functions of President of the United States in case of the death, resignation, removal, or disability of the President or Vice President; and reviving the grade of General in the army, and authorizing the President to appoint such officers. So much of the Presidents message as relates to freedmen was referred to a special committee. Proposed amendments to the Constitution were presented, annulling export duties, repudiating the rebel debt, and securing to all persons equal protection and the rights of liberty. A resolution was adopted instructing inquiry into the expediency of a naval depot on the southern shore of Lake Erie. Resolutions were offered, requesting the President to communicate information with regard to the reputed establishment of slavery in Mexico; declaring the colored soldiers should have all the rights of citizenship; for the appointment of a committee to consider what action shall be taken to repay the States their expenditures in connection with the rebellion and directing inquiry into the expediency of establishing a national military school in the Northwest. The House adjourned to Monday.

GLEANINGS.

—Owing to an omission at the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, the face of the five-twenty bonds recently issued for compound interest notes, does not stipulate whether the rate of interest is six per cent in coin or in currency. The law requires that this should be expressed on the face of the bond.

—In Mississippi a rebel was caught who was accused of being a spy. As usual in such cases, there was strong talk of hanging. Before starting on the march the next morning, the question arose, what had been done with the spy? "He was hung at daybreak this morning," said some one confidently. "No he wasn't" said our orderly sergeant dryly, "he had a sore throat, and they excused him."

The Alta Californian of the 10th ult., reports some remarkable discoveries of native silver in Idaho. It says: We hear that the Oregon Steam Navigation Company have discovered a mine which produces blocks of native silver as large as candle boxes, and they hammer it out like wagon tire. Several other mines of extraordinary richness have been discovered in the same locality, if the story be true. It is a well known fact that blocks of silver as large as candle boxes have been found in the mines of Mexico and Arizona, and it is settled beyond a doubt that the Owyhee region in Southwestern Idaho, is rich in silver lodes.

—A boarding-house keeper named Chas. Foster, and his wife, holding out in Chicago, have frequently of late, amused themselves as follows: They have about 30 boarders: and once in a while, when they indulge in the ardent a little too freely, they take all the delf ware in the house and divide it evenly. They then stand at each end of the table twenty-five feet long, and throw the delf at each other until it is all smashed. They then kiss and be friends, go to the crockery store and replace their closet with ammunition for another fight. On Sunday last they were enjoying this innocent pastime, when a boarder named Glosson, thinking they meant harm, tried to go between them, when he received a bowl with some momentum on the side of his head, which was cut and bled freely. Not relishing this part of the game of battledoor, he caused the parties to be arraigned before Justice McDonnell, who fined them each $10 and costs, and advised them to take a less dangerous and less expensive exercise.

The Largest Organ in the United States.

The new organ for the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's church, Brooklyn, will be completed by January next. E. & G. G. Hook of Boston are the builders. This organ is the largest ever built in America and costs twenty-five thousand dollars. The Boston Traveler says of it:

Several new features will be introduced in this organ, which have never before been brought into use in this country. The chief of these is the tuba marabilis, a reed stop of large scale voiced on a very high pressure of wind. A gentleman who heard this range of pipes tried on an organ in England, says that the effect was tremendous, and that in the grand chorus, at an oratorio, it overleaped and overpowered the combined efforts of the full organ and several hundred singers and instruments. It was beyond his power to describe. The Messrs. Hook have the exclusive control of the patent for this improvement in America.

The organ is to stand behind the pulpit, and is to occupy the whole space from the cellar floor to the ceiling of the church, and rising to the height of and behind the pulpit will be the bellows chamber; and from the pulpit level, forty feet upward, will rise the magnificent front of the instrument itself, the pipes of silver hue, the massive polished wood-work of black walnut. The breadth will be twenty-seven feet, and the depth twenty-one feet.

The front is to be in the Palladium style of architecture, a name derived from Paladio, an Italian architect. It will be simple, elegant and dignified, with nothing of the grotesque about it. A figure holding a harp will crown the instrument, and from above each of the side faces, will project in a ray shape, the trumpets of the tuba marabilis, above referred to, bending forward so as to throw the sound over the audience.

The organ is to have five bellows of different powers, so arranged as to regulate the supply of wind by the demand. The number of stops counting the registers that work by pedals, is seventy six; and here another improvement comes in for working the stops, that of the pneumatic lever, one to each stop. The pulling of the stop-key opens a valve which lets the wind into the particular little bellows-lever attached to that stop, and that does the work of "stopping" with quickness and certainty, with only a mere touch on the part of the operator. Still another improvement is the working of a series of pneumatic bellows for the whole organ, so that the wind of the main bellows does not work in answer to the slighest touch of the artist on the key-board When it is understood that in some great organs, a pressure of the finger equal to five or six or more pounds is required in some instances on a single key, when all the manuals and their connections are coupled, the value of this improvement will be seen at once.

A young lady in New Orleans had her eye put out, recently, while riding in a street car, by the careless flirting of the driver's whip.

Variety Column.

A. MOORE of Minneapolis has absconded with somebody's wife, says the local paper. That A-more should be stopped.

HISTORICAL.—Why did John Huss die a more agreeable death than Charles XII? Because a hot steak is better than a cold chop.

FIGURATIVE WIT.—Punch asks "Why is Fenianism hot?" and answers, with a wit too rare of late in its columns, "Because it is '98 in the shade."

PRENTICE OUT-PRENTICED. — Prentice says that as a man drinks, he generally grows reckless; in which case, as the Boston Post, the more drams the fewer scruples.

A SETTLER.—Gen. Butler went to Washington a short time ago to "settle up;" but on arriving there, he concluded to "settle down." We hope the settlement set ill with him.

LOOK OUT, LADIES!—An exchange says that "waterfalls" are prohibited by English game laws. The clause, which applies to them, runs as follows: "Netting the hare shall be punished by imprisonment," &c.

DUTIES TO BRUTES.—A country exchange speaking of preparation which should be made for shelter of animals through the coming winter, says: "Make a kennel for your dog, or locust him, we don't care which. Do not omit these duties to the brutes around you."

ALIBI PROVED.—Can one man be in two places at once? "Private Miles O'Reilly" (Col. G. G. Halpine), professes to be the resident editor of the Citizen in New York, but a man who lives upon the bank of the Mississippi will take his oath that he sees miles o' riley pass his door every morning.

LIGHT LUGGAGE. — Governor Weller of California was wrecked on the Golden Rule, and on arriving in San Francisco, he remarked to a friend, "Boat everything sir, everything but my reputation." "Governor," replied his friend, "you travel with less baggage than any man I ever saw."

WHAT PENNIES WERE MADE FOR.—Last Sunday little Ike, three years and a half old, went to church for the first time. His mother gave him a penny to put in the contribution box, which he did, and sat quiet for a few moments, and then wanted to know how soon the man was coming with the candy.

A DEAL TOO MUCH FOR HIM.—Two sons of green Erin were standing by a hydraulic press superintended by a friend of mine, when one called out to the other—"Jim, I'd like to put ye under and squaze the divil out o' yez." "Would ye, in-dade, my boy?" was the answer. "Squaze the divil out o' you, an' there'd be nothing left."

WISER THAN GRANDMA.—A little girl Pennsylvania was lately reproved for playing out doors with boys, and informed that being seven years old, she was "too big for that now." But with all imaginable innocence, she replied: "Why, Grandma, the bigger we grow, the better we like 'em." Grandma put on her specs.

NOT SO FAR FROM THE [redacted].—To be a woman of fashion is one of the easiest things in the world. A late writer thus describes it: "Buy everything you don't want, and pay for nothing you get; smile on all mankind but your husband; be happy everywhere but at home; neglect your children and nurse lap-dogs; go to church every time you get a new dress."

ON A COXCOMB.—The Saturday Press translates from the French the following choice epigram:

"How very contented Augustus must be;
So nicely apparelled, perfumed and curled;
For he is in love with himself, you see,
And hasn't a rival in all the world."

THE STYLE IN COLORADO.—One of the leading ministers of the Territory relates that on one occasion he was conversing with a Colorado lady on the vital subject of religion, and he asked her whether the consolations and ministrations of the church were as precious to her in her new home as in the States. To which query she responded, (in no irreverent spirit, but simply from force of habit,) "You bet!"

A PRECOCIOUS YOUNGSTER.—The Marshall (Iowa) Times man tells a tale about his little son:—Our "Johnny," standing in the door, the other day, saw a cow in the street. Said he, "Pa, what kind of a cow is that with no horns?" "Wh, Johnny, she is a mooley cow." Presently she turned around and Johnny's quick eye discovered her tail was gone. "Why, pa," said he, "she is mooley behind, too!"

NOT SO BAD AS IT USED TO BE.—Artemas Ward says that shooting isn't as popular in Nevada as it once was. A few years since, they used to have a dead man for breakfast every morning. A reformed desperado told me that he supposed that he had killed men enough to stock a grave yard. "A feeling of remorse" he said, "will sometimes come over me! But I'm an altered man now. I hain't killed a man for over two weeks. What'll yer poison yerself with?" he added, dealing a resonant blow to the bar.

A NICE EXPERIMENT.—Dr. Berit, in a paper forwarded to the French academy of science, says: "If the tail of a rat be cut off, skinned, and then inserted under the skin of the same animal, it will continue to live and grow as before. If a fracture is effected, the fractured parts will join again just exactly as if the tail were in its natural place; in short, both physiologically and pathologically, the grafted part follows the general laws of nature."

Suppose a rat-tail file be tried, Doctor, what then? Nothing iron ical in this inquiry—oh no!

A GRATIFYING REPORT.—The McGregor News in reporting the proceedings of a Bible Meeting, furnishes the following bit of information which it pronounces as "very gratifying:"

"From this statement of the Treasurer, we learn that a few years ago, the Society was $ in debt. Last year this indebtedness was reduced to $ and this year, the Society is out of debt, and has $ in the treasury. This certainly a very gratifying state of things."

We hope this exhibit is as gratifying to the Society as to the public. We had thought it would have a blank, dolorous look to them.

COULDN'T STOP IT.—When Gen'l Sully, last summer, on his expedition to the Devil's Lake, passed Fort Berthold, quite a number of Indians had gathered there to see him and make peace. They complained of a great deal of dry weather, and wished the General would make the rain the same as Father de Smet, the missionary that used to see them, had done. The General promised them he would do the best he could. It happened that shortly afterwards a heavy thunder shower passed, flooding everything. The Indians were greatly pleased, and called the General a great medicine man. But they all said it was a little too much at once. "Well," said the General, "I know it, but I couldn't help the thing after it started!"

CAPITAL BOUND TO WIN.—A "gemman ob color," belonging to Tehama recently made a pilgrimage to Red Bluff for the purpose of procuring an ebony helpmate, either as a partner in the laundry business or for life, he wasn't particular which. Arriving at his destination, he made known to the spouting Ethiope the object of his visit, and asked her consent to the proposition. After turning the question over in her mind for a moment she came out with:

"Lem, how much capital has you?"

"Well, Dinah, to tell you de truf, I'se only got four dollars wid me, jes now."

"Won't do, Lem, won't do! Sam Johnsing has got six an' a cookin' stove. I guess I'se gwine to hab him."

Poor Lem is still going alone.

EVEN WITH HIM.—According to the Fond du Lac Press, one of the dictatorial landlords of that section was come up with by a smart widow:

"How many chi dren have you?" is the general inquiry when looking after a vacant house—as if parents had no business to have any children—or if they have, landlords have a right to thrust them aside. We like the story of the good mother who went everywhere looking for a house, but her dozen children were always an objection. Finally, seeing she could not get a house, she sent her children to the graveyard to remain an hour or two. Calling on a landlord for house, his first inquiry was, "How children have you?" The good widow replied, "My children are all in the graveyard." She was instantly rented the house, and then moved in with her whole family. When the landlord heard the explanation, he found he was done for, and opened not his lips.

THE Great Newspaper, which has done more than any other modern journal to illustrate the peripatetic philosopher, is the Memphis Appeal. Our readers will hear with pleasure from the following paragraph in the Army and Navy Journal, that it has now got back to its starting point:

"Among the clearly defined and intelligible signs of "reconstruction" is the return to a local habitation and a name of our old friend the Memphis-Grenada-Jackson-Meridian-Atlanta-Montgomery-Columbus-Macon-Memphis Appeal, whose peregrinations during the war we used to notice. Then it had no local, but only an itinerary location; and not a name, but as many appellatives as Brigham Young's wife. It was a pilgrim upon the earth—its editor a sort of Ulysses or Wandering Jew among journalists. And as the doomed hero, according to romance, was fated to herald the approach of the plague, so the Appeal became, in spite of itself, Sherman's avant courrier. Now it returns to Memphis and to private life, and according to its own account, 'being now perfectly iron-clad with paroles, armistices and pardons, is on its feet again in robust and vigorous life.'"

HIS GIFT FOR THE UNION.—In a hospital at Nashville a short time ago, a wounded hero was lying on the amputation table under the influence of chloroform. They cut off his strong right arm and cast it all bleeding, upon the pile of human limbs. They then laid him gently upon his couch. He woke from his stupor, and missed his arm. With his left arm he lifted up the cloth, and there was nothing but the gory stump. "Where is my arm?" he cried: "get me my arm; I want to see it once more—my strong, right arm!" They brought it to him. He took hold of the cold, clammy fingers and looking steadfastly at the poor, dead member, he thus addressed it with tearful earnestness: "Good-by, old arm. We have been along time together. We must part now. Good-by, old arm. You'll never fire another carbine, nor swing another sabre for the government"—and the tears rolled down his cheeks. He then turned to those standing by: "Understand I don't regret its loss; it has been torn from my body that not one state should be torn from this glorious Union." He might have added:

"Some things are worthless—some others so good
That nations that buy them pay only in blood;
For Freedom and Union each man owes his part,
And here I pay my share right warm from my heart."

This is what that man gave. What is your share and mine?

Another Feline "Attachment."

MY DEAR EDITOR: Mr. Phœnix's entertaining description of his "feline attachmentt" as applied to a sewing machine, reminds me of a similar application of catpower in an ingenious musical instrument that I wot of. And as every successful attempt to utilize the incalculable feline energy which is constantly expended on our fences and roofs, and in our back yards, must be a public benefit, I hesitate the less to communicate what I know. I would simply suggest to Messrs. Mason & Hamlin that my friend intends to patent his invention, and I hope, therefore, that this (perhaps) premature announcement will not tempt them to apply it to their parlor organs, without paying him handsomely for the privilege. In perfecting his instrument, he has encountered much opposition, by reason of the refractory nature of the material, and has numerous scars to witness.

But, not to waste time, the contrivance to which I refer, is a Cat-seraphine, or Harmonica, and is constructed as follows: Thirteen cats of various ages and sizes are selected and tuned. The latter process is of peculiar delicacy and difficulty. A box is constructed with thirteen holes and a keyboard in front. The cats are introduced into the box, and their respective tails drawn through the holes to the full length, and secured by a slide drawn down upon them by a lever at one end. A sliding lid, with respiration, is also let down on the back side of the box. The extremities of the tails are then secured to the respective keys by a simple but efficient contrivance, the immediate effect of which is to keep up an undertone of feline remonstrance exceedingly suggestive and appetizing. The keys have a longer leverage than the ordinary piano keys—the peculiarity of the Cat-Seraphine being forte—and are so constructed as to bear an indefinite pressure, only limited by the resisting or tensible power of the tails. The instrument is now ready for use, and a practiced performer can produce surprising results. I ought not to omit mentioning, however, of the grand forte pedal, by means of which all the tails are pulled at once. This is used to produce the sforzando, and the effect is truly terrific. It is proposed to introduce it into certain passages of Wagner's "Tanphauser," and there can be no doubt that when it is done, the great composer will turn in his grave, or would, if he was dead.

It is necessary to say that when the performance is over, the cats should be liberated only to the extent of half their tails. Otherwise they immediately decamp for parts unknown, and manage to convey such a terror to the other cats in the neighborhood, that not an individual of the tribe is to be found within five miles. My friend having carelessly dismissed his orchestra at one time, giving them the range of a large room, had the mortification to see the whole tribe, headed by the double C in basso, down to the kitten, F in alto, dart instantly through a pane of glass, and disappear. He was obliged to go to a neighboring town to collect another instrument, and had vast trouble, at that.

It is clear that cats, like human beings, do not appreciate their capabilities, but that is no reason why their living organs as well as their resined intestines should not subserve the muse.

Yours, faithfully, ORPHEUS.

Terrible Death of a Tight Rope Performer.

[From the Richmond Whig, Nov. 30.[

Delane, whose real name is Thomas L. Huntley, was advertised to appear at the Wilmington theatre on Monday evening last, in conjunction with Charley White's Iron-Clads, in a tight rope performance. The rope extended from the stage to the centre gallery, forming a steep ascent that it appeared almost impossible to walk. At the appointed time, however, Huntley made his appearance, and with the heavy balance pole commenced his feat. He walked with great ease and success in the ascent, reaching the gallery amid the rapturous applause of the audience. In a few moments he turned to descend to the stage, but after taking a few steps he lost his foothold and fell, but succeeded in gaining the galleryr Apparently becoming mortified at his partial failure, he remounted the rope and attempted to descend to the stage backwards: but after proceeding a few feet from the gallery he again lost his balance, and then commenced a painful and thrilling struggle for life. Finding that he would probably fall from the rope, he threw his balance pole into the dress circle, and, it is supposed made an effort to spring into it himself. He merely, however, touched it with his feet, and was precipitated head downwards, into the parquet below, the left side of the head striking the corner of one of the seats, frightfully crushing the skull, and producing almost instant death.

The deceased was a native of Nashville, Tennessee, where he leaves a widowed mother, but has latterly been resident of Richmond, Virginia. He was aged between nineteen and twenty years. This was his second performance in public.

LYRICS OF TO-DAY.

I dined at Delmonico's yesterday
With my old chum, Harry Delmar;
After nuts and wine we sipped our café,
Each smoking a fragrant cigar.
And Harry said, "I have plenty of dimes—
For the world I don't care a pin;
And the reason you don't make money, my boy,
Is because you won't pitch in!"

Then he rattled on in his lively way
Of the schemes he had shrewly put through:
He thought he was sharp, but the "pound of flesh"
Made me think of Shylock, the Jew!
"First I went in—and made one of 'a pool,'
And 'fancy stocks' bought and sold;
There's truth in the adage of 'Luck to the fool,'
For I cleared five thousand in gold.

"Then I made a 'big thing' when Brown struck oil'
By buying a claim on the lands;
And, after a bout with the law's sharp foil,
The property fell to my hands.
I formed a company—easily done—
Sold my land for the ready tin;
So why should I care if the oil won't run?
I'm a hundred thousand in!

"A 'corner' in Erie put me ahead
About thirty-five thousand more;
While those who were bit have to work for their bread—
The gift Adam left to the poor.
Next came the War, and again I pitched in,
Got contracts, and went into gold;
If the row hadn't stopped, I'm sure I'd have been
The richer by full ten-fold!

"Then I married—built a house up town,
Have my servants and carriage too;
And now, I am going to settle down
In the hum-drum family line.
Give me joy for my luck! Tell me, my boy,
What fortune you've chanced to receive;
Your gold, I should say, has been mixed with alloy,
To judge by that empty sleeve."

"Ah! Harry, my friend, you're welcome to all!—
I put during the same dozen years,
Thro' heat and thro' cold, thro' sunshine and storm,
Thro' smiles and thro' blinding tears,
I've toiled day and night for the daily food
Of the loved ones left to my care;
The world has proved cold, but God has been good,
And given me strength to bear.

"I shouldered my gun at my country's call,
And fought till the conflict was done;
This stump of an arm and this minie ball
Are all the riches I won.
The times have been hard, and it seems dark now,
But the clouds must roll away;
So I wipe the sweat of toil from my brow,
And await the coming day." [WM. H. KENT.

Bryant & Stratton's system of Actual Business Practice, as caried out in the Chicago College, is the most extensive and complete exposition of Theory and Business combined, of anything that has heretofore been devised and put in practice. In a few months, by this system, a young man is changed from an ordinary student, laborer or clerk, to an accomplished business man, having the ability to transact, manage, record and talk about business affairs as he could not otherwise do without years of experience. We understand that there are some seven hundred students now in attendance at this college, and every department is in capital running order. Young men going to Chicago, should visit this college before making other arrangements, as it is the best introduction to business that one can have. The President's Message.

FELLOW CITIZENS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

To expre a gratitude to God, in the name of the people, for the preservation of the United States, is my first duty in addressing you.

Our thoughts next revert to the death of the late president by an act of parricidal treason. The grief of the nation is still fresh; it finds some solace in the consideration that he lived to enjoy the highest proof of its confidence by entering on the renewed term of the chief magistracy, to which he had been elected; that he brought the civil war substantially to a close; that his loss was deplored in all parts of the Union; and that foreign nations have rendered justice to his memory. His removal cast upon me a heavier weight of cares than ever devolved upon any one of his predecessors. To fulfill my trust I need the support and confidence of all who are associated with me in the various departments of government, and the support and confidence of the people. There is but one way in which I can hope to gain their necessary aid; it is, to state with frankness the principles which guide my application to the present state of affairs, well aware that the efficiency of my labors will in a great measure depend on your and their undivided approbation.

The Union of the United States of America was intended by its authors to last as long as the States themselves shall last. "THE UNION SHALL BE PERPETUAL" are the words of the confederation. "TO FORM A MORE PERFECT UNION," by an ordinance of the people of the United States, is the declared purpose of the constitution. The hand of Divine Providence was never more plainly visible in the affairs of men than in the framing and the adopting of that instrument. It is, beyond comparison, the greatest event in American history; and indeed, is it not, of all events in modern times, the most pregnant with consequences for every people of the earth? The members of the convention which prepared it brought to their work the experience of the confederation, of their several states, and of other republican governments, old and new; but they needed and they obtained a wisdom superior to experience. And when for its validity it required the approval of a people that occupied a large part of the continent and acted separately in many distinct conventions, what is more wonderful than that, after earnest contention and long discussion, all feelings and all opinions were ultimately drawn in one way to its support?

The constitution to which life was thus imparted contains within itself ample resources to its own preservation. It has power to enforce the laws, punish treason, and insure domestic tranquility. In case of the usurpation of the government of a State by one man, or an oligarchy, it becomes the duty of the United States to make good the guarantee to that State of a republican form of government, and so to maintain the homogeneousness of all. Does the lapse of time reveal defects? A simple mode of amendment is provided in the constitution itself, so that its conditions can always be made to conform to the requirements of advancing civilization. No room is allowed even for thought of a possibility of its coming to an end. And these powers of self preservation have always been asserted in their complete integrity by every patriotic chief magistrate—by Jefferson and Jackson, not less than by Washington and Madison. The parting advice of the Father of his Country, while yet President, to the people of the United States, was, that "the free constitution, which was the work of their hands, might be sacredly maintained;" and the inaugural words of President Jefferson held up "the preservation of the general government, in its constitutional vigor, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad." The constitution is the work of "the people of the United States," and it should be as indestructible as the people.

It is not strange that the framers of the constitution, which had no model in the past, should not have fully comprehended the excellence of their own work. Fresh from a struggle against arbitrary power, many patriots suffered from harassing fears of an absorption of State governments by the general government, and many from a dread that the states would break away from their orbits. But the very greatness of our country should allay the apprehension of encroachments by the general government. The subjects that come unquestionably within its jurisdiction are so numerous, that it must ever naturally refuse to be embarassed by questions that lie beyond it. Were it otherwise, the executive would sink beneath the burden; the channels of justice would be checked; legislation would be obstructed by excess; so that there is a greater temptation to exercise some of the functions of the general government through the states than to trespass on their rightful sphere. "The absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority" was, at the beginning of the century, enforced by Jefferson "as the vital principle of republics," and the events of the last four years have established, we will hope forever, that there lies no appeal to force.

The maintenance of the Union brings with it "the support of state governments in all their rights;" but it is not one of the rights of any state government to renounce its own place in the Union. The largest liberty is to be maintained in the discussion of the acts of the federal government; but there is no appeal from its laws, except to the various branches of that government itself, or to the people, who grant to the members of the legislative and of the executive departments no tenure but a limited one, and in that manner always retain the powers of redress.

"The sovereignty of the states" is the language of the confederacy, and not the language of the constitution. The latter contains the emphatic words: "The constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary, notwithstanding."

Certainly the government of the United States is a limited government; and so is every state government a limited government. With us, this idea of limitation spreads through every form of government, general, state and municipal, and rests on the great distinguishing principle of the recognition of the rights of man. The ancient republics absorbed the individual in the state, prescribed his religion, and controlled his activity. The American system rests on the assertion of the equal right of every man to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; to freedom of conscience, to the culture and exercise of all his faculties. As a consequence, the state government is limited, as to the general government in the interest of Union, as to the individual citizen in the interest of freedom.

States, with proper limitations of power, are essential to the existence of the constitution of the United States. At the very commencement, when we assumed a place among the powers of the earth, the Declaration of Independence was adopted by states; so also were the articles of confederation; and when the people of the United States ordained and established the constitution, it was the assent of the states, one by one, which gave it vitality. In the event, too, of any amendment to the constitution, the proposition of congress needs the confirmation of states. Without states, one great branch of the legislative government would be wanting. And, if we look beyond the letter of the constitution to the character of our country, its capacity for comprehending within its jurisdiction a vast continental empire is due to the system of states. The best security for the perpetual existence of the states is the "supreme authority" of the constitution of the United States. The perpetuity of the constitution brings with it the perpetuity of the states; their mutual relation makes us what we are; and in our political system their connection is indissoluble. The whole cannot exist without the parts, nor the parts without the whole. So long as the constitution of the United States endures, the states will endure; the destruction of the one is the destruction of the other; the preservation of the one is the preservation of the other.

I have thus explained my views of the mutual relations of the constitution and the states, because they unfold the principles on which I have sought to solve the momentous questions and overcome the appalling difficulties that met me at the very commencement of my administration. It has been my steadfast object to escape from the sway of momentary passions, and to derive a healing policy from the fundamental and unchanging principles of the constitution.

I found the states suffering from the effects of a civil war. Resistance to the general government appeared to have exhausted itself. The United States had recovered possession of their forts and arsenals; and their armies were in the occupation of every state which had attempted to secede. Whether the territory within the limits of those states should be held as conquered territory, under military authority emanating from the president as the head of the army, was the first question that presented itself for decision.

Now military governments, established for an indefinite period, would have offered no security for the early suppression of discontent; would have divided the people into the vanquishers and the vanquished: and would have envenomed hatred rather than restored affection. Once established, no precise limit to their continuance was conceivable. They would have occasioned an incalculable and exhausting expense. Peaceful emigration to and from that portion of the country, is one of the best means that can be thought of for the restoration of harmony; and that emigration would have been prevented; for what emigrant from abroad, what industrious citizen at home would place himself willingly under military rule? The chief persons who would have followed in the train of the army, would have been dependents on the general government, or men who expected profits from the miseries of their erring fellow-citizens. The powers of patronage and rule which would have been exercised, under the president over a vast and populous, and naturally wealthy region, are greater than, unless under extreme necessity, I should be willing to intrust to any one man; they are such as, for myself, I could never, unless in cases of great emergency, consent to exercise. The wilful use of such power, if continued through a period of years, would have endangered the purity of the general administration, and the liberties of the states which remained loyal.

Besides, the policy of military rule over a conquered territory would have implied that the states whose inhabitants had taken any part in the rebellion, had by the acts of those inhabitants ceased to exist. But the true theory is that all pretended acts of secession were from the beginning, null and void. The states cannot commit treason or screen the individual citizens who may have committed treason, any more than they can make valid treaties, or engage in lawful commerce with any foreign power. The states attempting to secede, placed themselves in a condition where their vitality was impaired but not extinguished—their functions suspenped, but not destroyed.

But if any state neglects or refuses to perform its offices, there is the more need that the general government should maintain all its authority, and as soon as practicable, resume the exercise of all its functions. On this principle I have acted, and have gradually and quietly, and by almost imperceptible steps, sought to restore the rightful energy of the general government and of the states. To that end, provisional governors have been appointed for the states, conventions called, governors elected, legislatures assembled, and senators and representatives chosen to the congress of the United States. At the same time, the courts of the United States as far as could be done have been reopened so that the laws of the United States may be enforced through their agency. The blockade has been removed and the custom-house re established in ports of entry, so that the revenue of the United States may be collected. The post office department renews its ceaseless activity, and the general government is thereby enabled to communicate promptly with its officers and agents. The courts bring security to persons and property; the opening of the ports invites the restoration of industry and commerce: the postoffice renews the facilities for social intercourse and business. And is it not happy for us all, that the restoration of each one of these functions of the general government, brings with it a blessing to the states over which they are extended? Is it not a sure promise of harmony and renewed attachment to the Union that after all that has happened, the return of the general government, is known only as a beneficence?

I know very well that this policy is attended with some risk; that for its success, it requires at least the acquiescence of the states which it concerns; that it implies an invitation to those States, by renewing their allegiance to the United States, to resume their functions as states in the Union. But it is a risk that must be taken; in the choice of difficulties, this is the smallest risk; and to diminish, and if possible, remove all danger, I have felt it incumbent on me to assert one other power of the general gogernment—the power of pardon. As no state can throw a defence over the crime of treason, the power of pardon is exclusively vested in the executive government of the United States, and an unqualified acknowledgment of the great social change of condition in regard to slavery, which has grown out of the war

The next step which I have taken to restore the constitutional relations of the states, has been an invitation to them to participate in the high office of amending the constitution. Every patriot must wish for a general amnesty at the earliest epoch consistent with the general safety. For this great end, there is need of a concurrence of all opinions in a spirit of mutual conciliation. All parties in the late terrible conflict, must work together in harmony. It is not too much to ask in the name of the whole people, that on one side the plan of restoration should proceed in conformity with a willingness to cast the disorders of the past into oblivion; and that on the other, the evidence of sincerity in the future maintainance of the Union shall be put beyond any doubt by the ratification of the proposed amendment to the constitution, which provides for the abolition of slavery forever within the limits of our country. So long as the adoption of this amendment is delayed, so long will doubt, and jealousy and uncertainty and enmity prevail. This is the measure which will efface the sad memories of the past; this is the measure which will most certainly call population and capital and security to those parts of the Union which need them most; indeed it is not too much to ask of the states which are now resuming their places in the great family of the Union, to give this pledge of perpetual loyalty and peace. Until it is done, the past, however much we may desire it, will not be forgotten. The adoption of the amendment will unite as beyond all power of disruption. It heals the wound that is still imperfectly closed, it removes slavery, the element which has so long perplexed and divided the country; it makes of us once more a united people, renewed and strengthened, bound more than ever to mutual affection and support.

The amendment to the constitution being adopted, it would remain for the states whose powers have so long been in abeyance, to resume their places in the two branches of the national legislature, and thereby complete the work of restoration. Here it is for you, fellow-citizens of the senate, and for you, fellow-citizens of the house of representatives, to judge, each of you for yourselves, of the elections, returns and qualifications of your own members.

The full assertion of the powers of the general government require the holding of the circuit courts of the United States within the district where their authority has been interrupted. In the present posture of our public affairs, strong objections have been made to holding these courts in any of the states where the rebellion has existed; and it was ascertained on inquiry that the circuit courts of the United States would not be held within the districts of Virginia during the autumn or early winter, nor until congress should have "an opportunity to consider and act on the whole subject." To your deliberations the restoration of this branch of the civil authority is therefore necessarily referred, with the hope that early provisions will be made for the resumption of all its functions.

It is manifest that treason of the most flagrant character has been committed. Persons who are charged with its commission should have fair and impartial trials in the highest civil tribunals of the country, in order that the constitution and the laws may be fully vindicated; the truth clearly established and affirmed that treason is a crime, that traitors should be punished and the offence made infamous; and at the same time the question may be judicially settled finally and forever, that no state of its own will has the right to renounce its place in the Union

The relations of the general government towards the four millions of inhabitants whom the war has called into freedom, have engaged my most serious consideration. On the propriety of attempting to make the freedmen electors by proclamation of the executive, I took for my counsel the constitution itself, the interpretations of that instrument by its authors, and their contemporaries, and recent legislation by Congress. When, at the first movement toward independence, the Congress of the United States instructed the several states to institute governments of their own, they left each state to decide for itself the condition of the enjoyment of the elective franchise. During the period of the confederacy, there appeared to exist a very great diversity in the quality of electors in the several states; and even within a state, a distinction of qualifications prevailed in regard to the officers who were to be chosen. The constitution of the United States recognizes these diversities, when it enjoins that in the choice of members of the house of representatives of the United States, "the electors in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."

After the formation of the constitution, it remained as before the uniform usage for each state to enlarge the body of its electors according to their own judgment; and under this system, one state after another has proceeded to increase the number of its electors, until now universal suffrage, or something very near it, is the general rule. So fixed was this reservation of power in the habits of the people, and so unquestioned has been the interpretation of the constitution, that during the civil war, the late president never harbored the thought—cer- never avowed the purpose—of disregarding it; and in the acts of Congress which were passed during that period, nothing can be found which, during the continuance of hostilities, much less at their close, would have sanctioned any departure by the Executive from a policy which has so uniformly obtained. Moreover a concession of the elective franchise to the freedmen by act of the President of the United States, must have been extended to all colored men wherever found, and so must have established a change of suffrage in the Northern, Middle and Western states, not less than in the Southern and Southwestern. Such an act would have created a new class of voters, and would have been an assumption of power by the President which nothing in the constitution or laws of the United States would have warranted.

On the other hand, every danger of conflict is avoided when the settlement of the question is referred to the several States. They can, each for itself, decide on the measure, and whether it is to be adopted at once and absolutely, or introduced gradually and with conditions. In my judgment, the freedmen, if they show patience and manly virtues, will sooner obtain a participation in the elective franchise through the States than through the general government, even if it had power to intervene. When the tumult of emotions that have been raised by the suddenness of the social change shall have subsided, it may prove that they will receive the kindliest usage from some of those on whom they have heretofore most closely depended.

But while I have no doubt that now, after the close of the war, it is not competent for the general government to extend the elective franchise in the several States, it is equally clear that good faith requires the security of the freedmen in their liberty and their property, their right to labor, and their right to claim the just return of their labor. I cannot too strongly urge a dispassionate treatment of this subject, which should be carefully kept aloof from all party strife. We must equally avoid hasty assumptions of any natural impossibility for the two races to live side by side in a state of mutual benefit and good will. The experiment involves us in no inconsistency; let us, then, go on, and make that experiment in good faith, and not be too easily disheartened. The country is in need of labor, and the freedmen are in need of employment, culture and protection. While their right of voluntary migration and expatriation is not be questioned, I would not advise their forced removal and colonization. Let us rather encourage them to honorable and useful industry, where it may be useful and beneficial to the country; and, instead of hasty anticipations of the certainty of failure, let there be nothing wanting to the fair trial of the experiment. The change in their condition is the substitution of labor by contract for the status of slavery. The freedmen cannot fairly be accused of unwillingness to work, so long as a doubt remains about his freedom of choice in his pursuits, and the certainty of his recovering his stipulated wages. In this the interests of the employer and the employed coincide. The employer desires in his workmen spirit and alacrity, and these can be permanently secured in no other way. And if the one ought to be able to enforce the contract, so ought the other. The public interest will be best promoted if the several States will provide adequate protection and remedies for the freedmen. Until this is in some way accomplished, there is no chance for the advantageous use of their labor, and the blame of ill success will not rest on them.

I know that sincere philanthrophy is earnest for the immediate realization of its remotest aim; but time is always an element in reform. It is one of the greatest acts on record to have brought four millions of people into freedom. The career of free industry must be fairly opened to them, and then their future prosperity and condition must, after all, rest mainly on themselves. If they fail, and so perish away, let us be careful that the failure shall not be attributable to any denial of justice. In all that relates to the destiny of the freedmen, we need not be too anxious to read the future; many incidents which, from a speculative point of view, might raise alarm, will quietly settle themselves.

Now that slavery is at its at end or near its end, the greatness of its evil, in the point of view of public economy, becomes more and more apparent. Slavery was essentially a monopoly of labor, and as such locked the states where it prevailed against the incoming of free industry. Where labor was the property of the capitalist, the white man was excluded from employment, or had but the second best chance of finding it; and the foreign emigrant turned away from the region where his condition would be so precarious. With the destruction of the monopoly, free labor will hasten from all parts of the civilized world to assist in developing various and immeasurable resources which have hitherto lain dormant. The eight or nine state nearest the Gulf of Mexico have a soil of exuberant fertility, a climate friendly to long life, and can sustain a denser population than is found as yet in any part of our country. And the future influx of population to them will be mainly from the north or from the most civilized nations in Europe. From the sufferings that have attended them during our late struggle, let us look away to the future, which is sure to be laden for them with greater prosperity than has ever before been known. The removal of the monopoly of slave labor is a pledge that these regions will be peopled by a numerous and enterprising population, which will vie with any in the Union in compactness, inventive genius, wealth and industy.

Our government springs from and was made for the people—not the people for the government. To them it owes allegiance; from them it must derive its courage, strength and wisdom. But, while the government is thus bound to defer to the people, from whom it derives its existence, it should, from the very consideration of its origin, be strong in its power of resistance to the establishment of inequalities. Monopolies, perpetuities and class legislation, are contrary to the genius of free government, and ought not to be allowed. Here, there is no room for favored classes or monopolies; the principle of our government is that of equal laws and freedom of industry. Wherever monopoly attains a foothold, it is sure to be a source of danger, discord and trouble. We shall fulfil our duties as legislators by according "equal and exact justice to all men," special privileges to none. The Government is subordinate to the people, it must be held superior to monopolies, which, in themselves, ought never to be granted, and which, where they exist, must be subordinate and yield to the government.

The constitution confers on congress the right to regulate commerce among the several states. It is of the first necessity, for the maintenance of the Union, that commerce should be free and unobstructed. No state can be justified in any scheme to tax the transit of travel and commerce between states. The position of many states is such that, if they were allowed to take advantage of it for purposes of local revenue, the commerce between states might be injuriously burdened, or even virtually prohibited. It is best, while the country is still young, and while the tendency to dangerous monopolies of this kind is still feeble, to use the power of congress so as to prevent any selfish impediment to the free circulation of men and merchandise. A tax on travel and merchandise, in their transit, constitutes one of the worst forms of monopoly, and the evil is increased if coupled with a denial of the choice of route. When the vast extent of our country is considered, it is plain that every obstacle to the free circulation of commerce between the States ought to be sternly guarded against by appropriate legislation, within the limits of the constitution.

The report of the secretary of the interior explains the condition of the public lands, the transactions of the patent office and pension bureau, the management of our Indian affairs, the progress made in the construction of the Pacific railroad, and furnishes information in reference to matters of local interest in the District of Columbia. It also presents evidence of the successful operation of the homestead act, under the provisions of which 1,160,533 acres of public lands were entered during the last fiscal year—more than one-fourth of the whole number of acres sold or otherwise disposed of during that period. It is estimated that the receipts derived from this source are sufficient to cover the expenses incident to the survey and disposal of the land entered under this act, and that payments in cash to the extent of from forty to fifty per cent. will be made by settlers, who may thus at any time acquire title before the expiration of the period at which it would otherwise vest. The homestead policy was established only after long and earnest resistance; experience protests its wisdom The lands, in the hands of industrious settlers, whose labor creates wealth, and contributes to the public resources, are are worth more to the United States than if they had been reserved as a solitude for future purchasers.

The lamentable events of the last four years, and the sacrifices made by the gallant men of our army and navy, have swelled the records of the pension bureau to an unprecedented extent. On the 30th day of June last, the total number of pensioners was 85,986, requiring for their annual pay, exclusive of expenses, the sum of $8,023,445. The number of applications that have been allowed since that date will require a large increase of this amount for the next fiscal year. The means for the payment of the stipends due, under existing laws, to our soldiers and sailors, and to the families of such as have perished in the service of the country, will no doubt be cheerfully and promptly granted. A grateful people will not hesitate to sanction any measures having for their object the relief of soldiers mutilated and families made fatherless in the efforts made to preseyve our national existence.

The report of the postmaster general presents an encouraging exhibit of the operations of the post office department during the year. The revenues of the past year from the loyal states alone exceeded the maximum annual receipts from all the states previous to the rebellion, in the sum of $6,038,091; and the annual increase of revenue during the last four years, compared with the revenues of the four years immediately preceding the rebellion, was $3,533,845. The revenues of the last fiscal year amounted to $14,556,158, and the expenditures to $13,694,728, leaving a surplus of receipts over expenditures of $861,440. Progress has made in restoring the postal service in the southern states. The views presented by the postmaster general against the policy of granting subsidies to ocean mail steamship lines upon established routes, and in favour of continuing the present system, which limits the compensation for ocean service to the postage earnings, are recommended to the careful consideration of congress.

It appears from the report of the secretary of the navy, that while, at the commencement of the present year, there were in commission 530 vessels of all classes and descriptions, armed with 3,000 guns and manned by 51,000 men, the present number of vessels in commission is 117, with 830 guns and 12,128 men. By this prompt reduction of the naval forces the expenses of the government have been greatly diminished, and a number of vessels purchased for naval purposes from the merchant marine, have been returned to the peaceful pursuits of commerce. Since the suppression of active hostilities our foreign squadrons have been re-established, and consist of vessels much more efficient than those employed on similar service previous to the rebellion. The suggestion for the enlargement of the navy yards, and especially for the establishment of one in fresh water for iron-clad vessels, is deserving of consideration, as is also the recommendation for a different location and more ample grounds for the naval academy

In the report of the secretary of war, a general summary is given of the military campaigns of 1864 and 1865, ending in the suppression of armed resistance to the national authority in the insurgent states. The operations of the general administrative bureau of the war department during the past year are detailed and an estimate made of the appropriations that will be required for military purposes in the fiscal year commencing the 30th day of June, 1866. The national military force on the 1st of May, 1865, numbered 1,000,516 men. It is proposed to reduce the military establishment to a peace footing, comprehending 50,000 troops of all arms, organized so as to admit of an enlargement by filling up the ranks to 82,600 men, if the circumstances of the country should require such an augmentation of the army. The volunteer force has already been reduced by the discharge from service of over eight hundred thousand troops, and the department is proceeding rapidly in the work of further reduction. The war estimates are reduced from $516,240,131 to $33,814,501, which amount, in the opinion of the department, is adequate for a peace establishment. The measures of retrenchment in each bureau and branch of the service exhibit a diligent economy worthy of commendation. Reference is also made in the report to the necessity of providing for a uniform militia system and to the propriety of making suitable provision for wounded and disabled officers and soldiers.

The revenue system of the country is a subject of vital interest to its honor and prosperity, and should command the earnest consideration of congress. The secretary of the treasury will lay before you a full and detailed report of the receipts and disbursements of the last fiscal year, of the first quarter of the present fiscal year, of the probable receipts and expenditures for the other three quarters, and the estimates for the year following the 30th of June, 1866. I might content myself with a reference to that report, in which you will find all the information required for your deliberation and decision. But the paramount importance of the subject so presses itself on my mind, that I cannot but lay before you my views of the measures which are required for the good character, and, I might almost say, for the existence of this people. The life of a republic lies certainly in the energy, virtue and intelligence of its citizens; but it equally true that a good revenue system is the life of an organized government. I meet you at a time when the nation has voluntarily burdened itself with a debt unprecedented in our annals. Vast as is its amount, it fades away into nothing when compared with the countless blessings that will be conferred upon our country and upon man by the preservation of the nation's life. Now, upon the first occasion of the meeting of Congress since the return of peace, it is of the utmost importance to inaugurate a just policy, which shall at once be put in motion, and which shall commend itself to those who come after us for its continuance. We must aim at nothing less than the complete effacement of the financial evils that necessarily followed a state of civil war. We must endeavor to apply the earliest remedy to the deranged state of the currency, and not shrink from devising a policy which, without being oppressive to the people, shall immediately begin to effect a reduction of the debt, and, if persisted in, discharge it fully within a definitely fixed number of years.

It is our first duty to prepare in earnest for our recovery from the ever-increasing evils of an irredeemable currency, without a sudden revulsion, and yet without untimely procrastination. For that end, we must, each in our respective positions, prepare the way. I hold it the duty of the Executive to insist upon frugality in the expenditures; and a sparing economy is itself a great national resource. Of the banks to which authority has been given to issue notes secured by bonds of the United States, we may require the greatest moderation and prudence, and the law must be rigidly enforced when its limits are exceeded. We may, each one of us, counsel our active and enterprising countrymen to be constantly on their guard to liquidate debts contracted in a paper currency, and, by conducting business as nearly as possible on a system of cash payments and short credits, to hold themselves prepared to return to the standard of gold and silver. To aid our fellow-citizens in the prudent management of their monetary affairs, the duty devolves upon us to diminish by law the amount of paper money now in circulation. Five years ago the bank-note circulation of the country amounted to not much more than two hundred millions; now the circulation, bank and national, exceeds seven hundred millions The simple statement of the fact recommends more strongly than any words of mine can do, the necessity of our restraining this expansion. The gradual reduction of the currency is the only measure that can save the business of the country from disastrous calamities; and this can be almost imperceptibly accomplished by gradually funding the national circulation in securities that may be made redeemable at the pleasure of the government.

Our debt is doubly secure—first in the actual wealth and still greater resources of the country; and next in the character of our institutions. The most intelligent observers among political economists have not failed to remark that the public debt of a country is safe in proportion as its people are free; that debt of a republic is the safest of all. Our history confirms and establishes the theory, and is, I firmly believe, destined to give it a still stronger illustration. The secret of this superiority springs not merely from the fact that in a republic the national obligations are distributed more through countless numbers in all classes of society; it has its roots in the character of our laws. Here all men contribute to the general welfare, and bear their fair share of the public burdens. During the war, under the impulse of patriotism, the men of the great body of the people, without regard to their own comparative want of wealth, thronged to our armies and filled our fleets of war, and held themselves ready to offer up their lives for the public good. Now, in their turn, the property and income of the country should bear their just proportion of the burden of taxation, while in our impost system, through means of which increased vitality is incidentally imparted to all the industrial interests of the nation, the duties should be so adjusted as to fall most heavily upon articles of luxury, leaving the necessaries of life as free from taxation as the absolute wants of the Government, economically administered, will justify. No favored class should demand freedom from assessment, and the taxes should be so distributed as not to fall unduly upon the poor, but rather on the accumulated wealth of the country. We should look at the national debt just as it is—not as a national blessing, but as a heavy burden on the industry of the country, to be discharged without unnecessary delay.

It is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury that the expenditures for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866, will exceed the receipts $112,194,947. It is gratifying, however, to state that it is also estimated that the revenue for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, will exceed the expenditures in the sum of $111,682,818. This amount, or so much as may be deemed sufficient for the purpose, may be applied to the reduction of the public debt, which, on the 31st day of October, 1865, was $2,740,854,750. Every reduction will diminish the total amount of interest to be paid, and so enlarge the means of still further reductions, until the whole shall be liquidated; and this, as will be seen from the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, may be accomplished by annual payments even within a period not exceeding thirty years. I have faith that we shall do all this within a reasonable time; that, as we have amazed the world by the suppression of a civil war which was thought to be beyond the control of any government, so we shall equally show the superiority of our institutions by the prompt and faithful discharge of our national obligations.

The Department of Agriculture, under its present direction, is accomplishing much in developing and utilizing the vast agricultural capabilities of the country, and for information respecting the details of its management reference is made to the annual report of the Commissioner.

I have dealt thus fully on our domestic affairs because of their paramount importance. Under any circumstances our great extent of territory and variety of climate, producing almost everything that is necessary for the wants, and even the comforts of man, make us singularly independent of the varying policy of foreign powers, and protect us against every temptation to "entangling alliances," while at the present moment the re-establishment of harmony, and the strength that comes from harmony, will be our best security against "nations who feel power and forget right." For myself it has been and will truly be my constant aim to promote peace and amity with all foreign nations and powers; and I have every reason to believe that they all, without exception, are animated by the same disposition. Our relations with the Emperor of China, so recent in their origin, are most friendly. Our commerce, with his dominions is receiving new developments; and it is very pleasing to and that the government of that great empire manifests great satisfaction with our policy, and reposes just confidence in the fairness which marks our intercourse. The unbroken harmony between the United States and the Emperor of Russia is receiving a new support from an enterprize designed to carry telegraphic lines across the continent of Asia, through his dominions, and so to connect us with all Europe by a new channel of intercourse. Our commerce with South America is about to receive encouragement by a direct line of mail steamships to the rising empire of Brazil. The distinguished party of men of science who have recently left our country to make a scientific exploration of the natural history and rivers and mountain ranges of that region, have received from the Emperor that generous welcome which was to have been expected from his constant friendship for the United States, and his well known zeal in promoting the advancement of knowledge A hope is entertained that our commerce, with the rich and populous countries that border the Mediterranean Sea, may be largely increased. Nothing will be wanting on the part of this government to extend the protection of our flag over the enterprise of our fellow-citizens. We receive from the powers in that region assurances of good will; and it is worthy of note that a special envoy has brought us messages of condolence on the death of our late chief magistrate from the Bey of Tunis, whose rule includes the old dominions of Carthage, on the African coast.

Our domestic contest, now happily ended, has left some traces in our relations with one at least of the great maratime powers. The formal accordance of belligerent rights to the insurgent states was unprecedented, and has not been justified by the issue. But in the system of neutrality maintained by the powers that made that concession, there was a marked difference. The materials of war for the Confederate States, were furnished in a great measure from the work shops of Great Britian; and British ships, manned by British subjects, and prepared for receiving British armaments, sailed from the ports of Great Britian to make war upon American commerce, under the shelter of a commission from the insurgent states. These ships, having once escaped from British ports, ever afterward entered them in any part of the world to refit and so renew their depredations. The consequences of this conduct were most disastrous to the states then in rebellion, increasing their desolation and misery by the prolonging of the civil contest. It had moreover the effect to drive the American flag from the seas to a great extent, and to transfer much of our shipping and our commerce to the very power whose subjects had created a necessity for such a change. These events took place before I was called to the administration of the Government. The sincere desire for peace by which I am animated, led me to approve the proposals already made to submit the question which has thus arisen between the two countries to arbitration. These questions are of such moment that they must have attracted the attention of the great Powers, and are so interwoven with the peace and interests of every one of them as to have ensured an impartial decision. I regret to inform you that Great Britain declined the arbitrament, but, on the contrary, invited us to the formation of a joint commission to settle mutual claims between the two countries, from which those for the depredations before mentioned should be entirely excluded. The proposition in that altogether unsatisfactory form, has been declined.

The United States did not present the subject as an impeachment of the good faith of a power which was professing the most friendly dispositions, but as involving questions of public law, of which the settlement is essential to the peace of nations; and, though pecuniary reparation to their injured citizens would have followed incidentally on a decision against Great Britain, such compensation was not their primary object. They had a higher motive, and it was in the interests of peace and justice to establish important principles of international law. The correspondence will be placed before you. The ground on which the British minister rests his justification is, substantially, that the municipal law of a nation, and the domestic interpretations of that law, are the measure of its duty as a neutral; and I feel bound to declare my opinion, before you and before the world, that that justification cannot be sustained before the tribunal of nations. At the same time I do not advise any present attempt at redress by acts of legislation. For the future, friendship between the two countries must rest on the basis of mutual justice.

From the moment of the establishment of our free constitution, the civilized world has been convulsed by revolutions in the interests of democracy or of monarchy; but through all these revolutions the United States have wisely and firmly refused to become propagandists of republicanism. It is the only government suited to our condition; but we have never sought to impose it on others; and we have constantly followed the advice of Washington to recommend it only by the careful preservation and prudent use of the blessing. During all the intervening period the policy of European powers and of the United States has, on the whole, been harmonious. Twice, indeed, rumors of the invasion of some parts of America, in the interest of monarchy have prevailed; twice my predecessors have had occasion to announce the views of this nation in respect to such interference. On both occasions the remonstrance of the United States was respected, from a deep conviction, on the part of European governments, that the system of non-interference and mutual abstinence from propagandism was the true rule for the two hemispheres. Since those times we have advanced in wealth and power; but we retain the same purpose to leave the nations of Europe to chose their dynasties and form their own systems of government. This consistent moderation may justly demand a corresponding moderation. We should regard it as a great calamity to ourselves, to the cause of good government, and to the peace of the world, should any European power challenge the American people, as it were, to the defence of republicanism against foreign interference. We cannot foresee and are unwilling to consider what opportunities might present themselves, what combinations might offer to protect ourselves against designs inimical to our form of government. The United States desire to act in the future as they have ever acted heretofore; they never will be driven from that course but by the aggression of European powers; and we rely on the wisdom and justice of those powers to respect the system of non-interference which has so long been sanctioned by time, and which, by its good results, has approved itself to both continents.

The correspondence between the United States and France, in reference to questions which have become subjects of discussion between the two governments, will, at a proper time, be laid before congress.

When, on the organization of our government, under the constitution, the President of the United States delivered his inaugural address to the two houses of congress, he said to them, and through them to the country and to mankind, that "the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government are justly considered as deeply, perhaps as finally staked on the experiment entrusted to the American people." And the house of representatives answered Washington by the voice of Madison: "We adore the invisible hand which has led the American people, through so many difficulties, to cherish a conscious responsibility for the destiny of republican liberty." More than seventy-six years have glided away since these words were spoken; the United States have passed through severer trials than were foreseen; and now, at this new epoch in our existence as one nation, with our Union purified by sorrows, and strengthened by conflict, and established by the virtue of the people, the greatness of the occasion invites us once more to repeat, with solemnity, the pledges of our fathers to hold ourselves answerable before our fellow-men for the success of the republican form of government. Experience has proved its sufficiency in peace and in war; it has vindicated its authority through dangers, afflictions, and sudden and terrible emergencies, which would have crushed any system that had been less firmly fixed in the heart of the people. At the inauguration of Washington the foreign relations of the country were few, and its trade was repressed by hostile regulations; now all the civilized nations of the globe welcome our commerce, and their governments profess towards us amity. Then our country felt its way hesitatingly along an untried path, with states so little bound together by rapid means of communication as to be hardly known to one another, and with historic traditions extending over few years; now intercourse between the states is swift and intimate; the experience of centuries has been crowded into new generations, and has created an intense, indestructible nationality. Then our jurisdiction did not reach beyond the inconvenient boundaries of the territory which had achieved independence; now, through cessions of lands, first colonized by Spain and France, the country has acquired a more complex character, and has for its natural limits the chain of lakes, the Gulf of Mexico, and on the east and west the two great oceans. Other nations were wasted by civil wars for ages before they could establish for themselves the necessary degree of unity; the latent conviction that our form of government is the best ever known to the world, has enabled us to emerge from a civil war within four years, with a complete vindication of the constitutional authority of the general government, and with our local liberties and state institutions unimpaired. The throngs of emigrants that crowd to our shores are witnesses of the confidence of all people in our permanence. Here is the great land of free labor, where industry is blessed with unexampled rewards, and the bread of the workingman is sweetened by the consciousness that the cause of the country is his own cause, his own safety, his own dignity." Here every one enjoys the free use of his faculties and the choice of activity as a national right. Here, under the combined influence of a fruitful soil, genial climes, and happy institutions, population has increased fifteen-fold within a century. Here, through the easy development of boundless resources, wealth has increased with two-fold greater rapidity than numbers, so that we have become secure against the financial vicissitudes of other countries, and, alike in business and in opinion, are self-centred and truly independent. Here more and more care is given to provide education for every one born on our soil. Here religion, released from political connection with civil government, refuses to subserve the craft of statesmen, and becomes in its independence, the spiritual life of the people. Here toleration is extended to every opinion, in the quiet certainty that truth needs only a fair field to secure the victory. Here the human mind goes forth unshackled in the pursuit of science, to collect stores of knowledge and acquire an over-increasing mastery over the forces of nature. Here the national domain is offered and held in millions of separate freeholds, so that our fellow-citizens, beyond the occupants of any other part of the earth, constitute in reality a people. Here exists the democratic form of government by the confession of the European statesmen, "gives a power of which no other form is capable, because it incorporates every man with the state, and arouses every thing that belongs to the soul."

Where, in past history, does a parallel exist to the public happiness which is within the reach of the people of the United States? Where in any part of the globe, can institutions be found so suited to their habits or so entitled to their love as their own free constitution? Every one of them, then, in whatever part of the land he has his home, must wish its perpetuity. Who of them will not now acknowledge, in the words of Washington, that "every step by which the people of the United State have advanced to the character of an independent nation, seems to have been distinguished by some token of Providential agency?" Who will not join with me in the prayer, that the invisible hand which has led us through the cloud that gloomed around our path, will so guide us onward to a perfect restoration of fraternal affection, that we of this day may be able to transmit our great inheritance, of state governments in all their rights, of the general government in its whole constitutional vigor, to our posterity, and they to theirs through countless generations? ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, December 4, 1865.

EXTRAORDINARY MEMORY.—A lady in Boston, now nearly 70 years old, can repeat all the psalms of David, and the proverbs of Solomon by heart. No matter at what verse one may begin, she will take up the cue, and proceed to the end of the chapter. We were reminded of this singular fact by a notice in a cotemporary of the widow of Nicholas Chase, an old lady of 87, who lives at Cuttyhunk, who can repeat page after page of the books which interested her in her youth, and is never better pleased than when she can get some young person to listen to her.

RULE OF THREE.—Two Irishmen having bought a bag of meal, suspected that the miller had cheated them, and to settle the question they balanced the plank on the fence, placed a pile of stones on the other, and then guessed at the stones.

—Five cases of child murder were reported in one day in London.

These Bitters are prepared, in pure Bourbon Whiskey, from a combination of over twenty different kinds of roots, barks and herbs, which act in perfect concert one with other, prepared from the original formula given by the great chief, Red Jacket, to Dr. Chapin, who used them successfully in his practice for many years, and by their use gained so great a popularity in the treatment and cure of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Constipation, Sick and Nervous Headache, Fever and Ague, and all diseases arising from torpid liver or indigestion. Persons suffering from either of these loathsome diseases will find a sure cure by the use of these Bitters, which are perfectly pure and free from all those drugs and poisons usually put up in such preparations and palmed off on an unsuspecting public. A single trial will convince the most skeptical that in the RED JACKET there is virtue which no other Bitters possess.

They strengthen and invigorate the system.
They are unequaled for general debility.
They are a sure cure for dyspepsia.
They give a good and healthy appetite.
They assist digestion.
They are the best stimulant in existence.
They are a preventive of Fever and Ague.
They relieve constipation.
They cure Nervous Headache.
They are perfetly pure and palatable

Aged persons and delicate females will find they can save large doctor's bills by the use of these Bitters.

Beware of counterfeits. The Red Jacket Bitters, are only sold in bottles with our name blown on the side, and our private government stamp across the cork. —OUR—

For Medicinal and Table uses, which are perfectly pure, and need only be tried to be appreciated. None genuine unless they have our gold label on each bottle, and our initials pressed in wax over the cork.

Sold by all druggists and dealers throughout the country. Call for our goods and take no other.

His Spanish Merinos are of the very best blood, while his Chester White hogs are literally a sight. He has two Chester White pigs, lately imported from Pensylvania, for which he paid $30; and we saw three hogs of the same breed, weighing 800 lbs. each. R. C. MOORE.

☞ At a meeting held at the School House in District No. 6, Tecumseh, on the evening of Dec. 15th 1865, convened pursuant to a public call, at which there was a large attendance of the Farmers of said District, the following Preamble and Resolutions were passed.

Whereas, we have full confidence in the prosperity of the "Farmers Mutual Fire Insurance Company" of Lenawee county Mich., and its ability to meet promptly its liabilities at all times; each member having for his or her security the real wealth of the county, and not only this, but the pledged honor of that class of men in whom they can confide, who are ever able and willing, to meet promptly every obligation resting upon them: therefore,

Resolved, That we have full confidence in the capability and integrity of its officers, that we heartily sustain them in their last annual report having acted in good faith, in behalf of their trust.

Resolved, That we ignore with contempt the unjust course pursued by the officers and agents of the Michigan State Insurance Co. in misrepresenting the merits of the Farmers Mutual Insurance Company and the liability of its members.

CHRISTMAS TREE.—The friends of the Universalist Sunday School in this village, as we are informed, are preparing a Christmas tree for the especial gratification of the little folks, which will be exhibited at the Universalist church on the evening of Christmas day. Application has been made to SANTA CLAUS to be present in person; but no answer having as yet been received to the application, it is not known whether his numerous engagements will admit of his being present. But whether he is present in person or by proxy, he has promised numberless beautiful gifts to the children of the Sunday School. Doors open at 6 o'clock.

ORDINATION SERVICES.—On Monday evening last the Right Rev. Bishop McCrosky held services at the Episcopal Church in this village during which five persons were confirmed. Tuesday morning the Rev. J. W. Ray was duly ordained by the Bishop as priest in the Episcopal Church. The ordination ceremony was very impressive, and the remarks of the Bishop at its close were remarkably felicious and appropriate.—The occasion will doubtless long be remembered by those who participated.

CHRISTMAS IS COMING, so is SANTA CLAUS at C. H. ADAM & Co's. Charley has just recieved a large stock of Goods from Boston, and other notions for the Holidays.

The "LITERARY COMPANION" is an elegant, moral and refined, miscellaneous Family Journal. Its columns are devoted to Polite Literature, Wit and Humor, Prose and Poetic Gems. An unrivalled corps of the best writers and artists have been engaged for the coming year, and several new and popular features will be introduced. Among which will be a page of Natural History illustrated; a page of illustrations from the Bible, numerous engravings, beginning with the creation of the World; also winter evening amusements with engravings, Illustrated Rebuses, &c. In size the "Literary Companion" is some fifteen hundred square inches, forming a mammoth weekly of sixteen octavo pages, and containing nearly twice as much reading matter and of a more refined character than any other weekly paper. No money or pains will be spared in order to render "GLEASON'S ILLUSTRATED LITERARY COMPANION" for 1866 the handsomest and best weekly paper ever produced in the United States. ☞ A. J. Hoag would like to call the attention of the public to his large and well selected stock of Frames and cases the best in Lenawee county, comprisising over 75 different styles of frames and an endless variety of cases, all of which will be sold as cheap as can be bought anywhere. I will not be undersold. I buy direct from the manufacturers and wish to have it understood that I will not be beat on price or quality. Large frames from 40cts. up. Call see them—also a fine stock of Albums. My facilities for making pictures are unsurpassed by anything in the state, and having taken the first premium for two years past I feel confident of giving satisfaction to all who will grve me a fair trial. Come one, come all; and see for yourselves.

☞ A cheap article is always dearest in the end. This is true in every trade and calling but it is preeminently so in Insurance. An Insurance company has no power to produce money by magic, there is no mystery in their transactions; the same law is as essential to their prosperity as to individuals; their income must exceed their expenditures or they will be consigned to Bankruptcy. The failure of over two hundred second-rate insurance companies in the United States during the last twenty-five years, is a fearful illustration of this fact. Get the genuine article—the old Phœnix of Hartford.

☞ R. C Moore has returned from New York—having purchased his stock when the market was at the lowest figures which have been reached for six months past and is prepared to offer goods to buyers at the lowest market rates,—there is no prospect of goods being any lower this season—and there is no reason why those in want of Goods should not now buy—there has been a heavy decline in domestics within the last two months,—so that they, who are judges of Goods, cannot fail to see it,—those who have an indistinct idea that goods have become worthless and can be bought for almost nothing, had better wait until they can see their error. Goods are low now and the demand from the South, for Goods, in the month of January next, must have the tendency to advance prices again.

For Sale Cheap.—One span of 5 year old bay horses, as sound as a bullet. TYNDALL & SLAYTON.

Gold Backs.

"Gold and green is hereafter to be the lively of our national currency," a cotemporary remarks. "The new gold certificates which are to be immediately issued, are printed on yellow tinted paper, an indication of their basis of value, and to distinguish them from the greenbacks, which, in process of time, will come to mean gold, too. When we first announced the purpose of Mr. McCulloch to issue these gold certificates we called it the first step towards the resumption of specie payments, and it will prove such. When a sufficiency of these gold certificates shall have been put into circulation to serve the purpose of a convertible curency, a corresponding amount of greenbacks of the higher denominations may be withdrawn, and gradually a specie-paper currency be brought into use, without any of the disturbing influences which a sudden change from one kind to the other would cause. For all Government purposes; for the payment of duties at the custom-houses: for the settlement of balances; for remittances abroad, except to China; and for the payment of interest on the five-twenties and ten-forties, these gold certificates will not only be as good as gold, but a good deal better, inasmuch as they will be more convenient to handle, and less costly to transport. This is one step toward specie payments, and another has been taken by our prudent head of the Treasury Department, in the virtual retirement of all the compound interest-bearing notes. Gold has not yet shown a disposition to fall in price under the influence of these measures for the very good reason that the gold certificates have not yet been issued, and the compound interest notes were already to a great extent, withdrawn from circulation before the Secretary commenced funding them. But we shall not have to wait long before gold will begin to fall, and with it the prices of many other commodities."

Jeff. Davis thinks that President Johnson's message is, in general, a wise and good document, but is disappointed that it does not speak specifically in regard to the disposition to be made of Davis, himself.

Incidents and Accidents.

He walked around to the spot where the banker stood, who was talking with a gentleman, and said to him, 'Please move, sir,' and the banker did. The fellow coolly took from the safe several thousand dollars in U. S. bonds, and as coolly walked away, and has never been heard of from that day to this. Near the closing hour of business, the bonds were sought for for and could not be found. The banker turned to one of the clerks, and asked for them, stating that he saw him remove them from the drawer. Fortunately the clerk was able to prove an alibi, and then the audacity of the thief was made apparent."

A Pugilists Funeral.

The London correspondent of the New York Tribune says:

"The funeral of Tom Sayers, though by no means equal to some memorable obsequies in New York, was still something of a spectacle. Crowds of the roughest kind of roughs gathered early in the streets of Camden Town, the suburb of his residence. The public houses were draped in mourning and drove a roaring trade. Convivial parties drank their beer at the open windows, sang songs and shouted choruses. It was the next thing to a hanging in front of Newgate. While waiting for the hearse, the crowds in the streets were entertained by bands of negro minstrels. The chief mourner was a brown dog, his collar trimmed with black crape. There were thirty thousand people who proceeded or followed the mortal remains to Highgate—a large portion of them were bullet-headed, big-jawed fighting men, and boys who do not work, nor as yet vote for a living, and yet manage to have enough to eat, and more than enough to drink. These, yelling and swearing, swarmed into the beautiful Highgate Cemetery, playing leap-frog over the tombstones. They climbed the trees and squatted on monuments to get a good sight of "The grave where their hero was buried."

The service was read, and then with catcalls, oaths and yells, they rolled off to the nearest public house to drown their sorrows.

—Two men at Rockford state that on last Tuesday evening, as they were walking by the park, they were startled by a report like that of a pistol, accompanied by a blinding flash of light at the same time, and were conscious of a shock not unlike that received from a galvanic battery. She had genuine humor as well as he; and as physiologists know, there is a sort of a mental tickling which is above and beyond control, being under the reflex system and instinctive as sighing. She laughed with her whole body and soul, and burst the abscess, and was well.

McCook. The papers went to Mr. Lincoln, and had not been acted upon when Mr. Johnson came into office. He finding the papers, approved the sentence, and telegraphed Governor Brownlow, asking what had become of Gurley. VISIT OF SANTA CLAUS.

BY C. C. MOORE.

The author of this immortal poem, says the Western Rural Gazette, was CLEMENT C. MOORE, Esq., of New York, who wrote it for his children. A friend of the family surreptitiously obtained a copy and published it, greatly to that good gentleman's mortification. This feeling was unnecessary, however, for it has rendered his name immortal, as his really imaginative poem will probably be—or should be—reprinted every Christmas to the end of time.

Twas the night before Christmas, when all through the house,
Not a creature was stirring, not even a mouse;
The stockings were hung by the chimney with care,
In hope that St. Nicholas soon would be there;
The children were nestled all snug in their beds,
While visions of sugar-plums danced in their heads;
And mamma in her kerchief and I in my cap,
Had just settled our brains for a long winter's nap—
When out on the lawn there arose such a clatter,
I sprang from my bed to see what was the matter;
Away to the window I flew like a flash,
Tore open the shutter and threw up the sash.
The moon on the breast of the new-fallen snow,
Gave the lustre of mid-day to objects below.
When what to my wondering eyes should appear,
But a miniature sledge and eight tiny reindeer,
With a little old driver so lively and quick,
I knew in a moment it must be St. Nick.
More rapid than eagles his coursers they came,
And he whistled and shouted, and called them by name;
"Now Dasher! now Dancer! now Prancer and Vixen,
On Comet! on Cupid! on Dunder and Blitzen!
To the top of the porch, to the top of the wall!
Now dash away, dash away, dash away all!"
As dry leaves that before the wild hurricane fly,
When they meet with an obstacle, mount to the sky
So up to the housetop the coursers they flew;
With a sleigh full of toys—and St. Nicholas too.
And then in a twinkling I heard on the roof,
The pawing and prancing of each little hoof.
As I drew in my head and was turning around,
Down the chimney St. Nicholas came with a bound.
He was dressed all in fur from his head to his foot,
And his clothes were tarnished with ashes and soot;
A bundle of toys he had flung on his back,
And he looked like a pedlar just opening his pack.
His eyes how they twinkled! his dimples how merry!
His cheeks were like roses—his nose like a cherry;
His droll little mouth was drawn up like a bow,
And the beard on his chin was as white as the snow;
The stump of a pipe he held tight in his teeth,
And the smoke it encircled his head like a wreath.
He had a broad back and a little round belly
That shook when he laughed like a bowl full of jelly,
He was chubby and plump—a right jolly old elf,
And I laughed when I saw him in spite of myself.
A wink of his eye and a twist of his head
Soon gave me to know I had nothing to dread.
He spoke not a word, but went straight to his work
And filled all the stockings, then turned with a jerk
And laying his finger aside of his nose,
And giving a nod up the chimney he rose;
Then sprang to his sleigh—to his team gave a whistle,
And away they all flew like the down of the thistle;
But I heard him exclaim as he drove out of sight,
"MERRY CHRISTMAS TO ALL, AND TO ALL A GOOD NIGHT!"

Chicago and the Opera.

One day last week we took it into our head that we would give the Chicago people a surprise, or, in other words, that we would slip down there without giving them any notice of our coming, and put them in a flutter.—But to our astonishment when we got there, we found the thing had got out, and the whole city was all alive. We shall not give a detailed account of our reception; it is sufficient to say that it was all we expected.—We conveyed ourself to the Revere House, where a sumptuous repast was in readiness for us. After dinner we strolled out to see the city, independent of the Board of Trade. We hate formalities. Chicago is decidedly an institution of itself. It is larger than Racine; but after a careful investigation we were convinced that it was in consequence of there being more houses in it than in Racine, but that is in consequence of their buying and selling more stuff.

Chicago is a queer place, and made up of queer people. Everybody is after somebody, and somebody gets taken down sometimes, and sometimes he don't. Everybody is in the streets a going it as though they were afraid somebody would get somewhere first.

Men in Chicago get up from their pallet of straw as poor and ragged and destitute as Lazarus, and go forth to their task in sorrow, and return clothed in purple and fine linen fare sumptuously, and lay their heads upon downy pillows at night, rejoicing, and the Prince of to day is a Lazzaroni to-morrow.

They are great on amusements. The love of fast horses prevails extensively, for they are a fast people. The pulpit has declared war on the stage, and there is a fearful struggle raging among the adherents of those institutions at this time. We are compelled to say, from what we saw, the people have not commenced going back on the theatre much yet. Of course, we had no opportunity of judging how matters stood with the church; but we presume it is all right. People that are in the habit of indulging in sinful practices during the week, usually go to meeting on Sunday to wipe it out.

Of course, as Grant and Sherman, and other distinguished personages visit theatres and operas, it was proper for us to do so.—Now, it so happened that we had never, in our long and eventful life, seen an opera, tho' we had heard, in our youthful days, what was very much like it, in Ohio, before civilization had cleared away the forests and drove away the wolves. We have now ascertained that the music of those animals, when they were able to congregate in sufficient numbers, was decidedly operatic. We had heard and read so much about what she had on, and what she wore to the opera, and how the men wore white vests and kids, we supposed we should not be admitted if we presented ourselves in a common rig, and so we went over to the Tremont House and hunted up our old friend Charley Rice, and tried to borrow a white vest and kids. Knowing him to be in the mule trade, we supposed he would have such things; but Charley either could not, or would not furnish us with the desired articles. But we found upon presenting ourselves at the ticket office that they grabbed our greenback with the same avidity that they did those who belonged to the white kid fraternity.

We now ushered ourselves, for the first time, into Crosby's Opera House, Chicago. The fabled palace of Aladdin could not have compared with it in splendor. We strolled along down the aisle with an attempt at indifference, with which we hoped to deceive the audience into the idea that we had seen about places than that, ws. Before we took our seat we drew ourself up to our full height and took a survey around the room, and, upon our honor, there were at least four hundred little double barrelled things levelled right at us, but having had some experience where heavier metal was used, we were able to stand the volley. They all soon came to an "order arms," except one old thing, and she was the hardest looking of the crowd. She stuck to her aim with a tenacity that boded evil to us. We confess to have got a little nervous during the evening, for she continued to draw a bead upon us whenever anything took place that she thought would please us. We felt a sense of relief upon getting out doors, and yet we shall always be haunted with a desire to know what conclusion she came to respecting us; whether she supposed she had really found her affinity or not.

Now, we suppose it is due to our readers that we give a learned criticism upon the opera, but we cannot do it; we do not understand the proper terms used by the modern critics. They were not in Webster's old fashioned spelling-book, nor in the Bible, and, of course, they are outside of our reading. But we will do the best we can in our own way.

Well, after sitting there about an hour, some of them hit the old triangle behind the curtain, and out popped about forty men, more or less, in front of the stage. Some had one kind of an instrument, and some another. We think they had all the kinds there is, except the harp of a thousand strings. They spread themselves out about a hundred feet, when out popped a chap in white kids, with a small stick in his hand, and got upon a stool and commenced to thrash around. Presently one of the musicians tooted, and then another, until they all got to going it, all on a discord, not the slightest approach to harmony, no more than there would be with a lot of earthquakes, thunderstorms and tornadoes all mixed up together.

Well, the curtain at last rose, and there stood about fifty chuckle-headed chaps, with all sorts of fancy fixings on, made of calico, velvet, rags, ribbons, lace and feathers. Of course, all the little double barrelled things were levelled at them. Presently one chap, with a sort of a jug-shaped face and cat-fashioned eyes, turned up his head and gave a short howl, a sort of a cross between the wolf and the dying wail of a stuck pig. Soon another, then two more with immense bovine voices struck in, and then they all struck in, and made night hideous with their trashy discord. About this time the songs left the stage (They were dressed in a sort of a butternut rig, and looked like a sorry lot of rebel prisoners.) They were followed by the gewgaw crowd, with the exception of the cat-eyed chap and a squally-looking woman. Then he commenced to howl, and bark, and bellow, and crow, and she screeched, and mewed, and purred and cackled; they run up towards each other and run back. Then came a gay looking fellow with a letter, and we must say that he had the sweetest little face we ever saw stuck on a boy's shoulders, and he howled very sweetly; we soon discovered by the things he walked on that he was not a boy!

Well that was about all there was to this round; the curtain went down amidst a good deal of stamping. After sitting there another hour, the triangle sounded, the fiddlers popped out, and the curtain went up. This time there was nothing on the stage but an old squaw who seemed to be making soap. She had a large cauldron kettle in an arch underneath which a bright fire was burning. At her feet was a skull and some other human looking bones, which satisfied us that in consequence of the high price of grease, she had been compelled to work up some old lager beer fellow. The soap was nearly done, for she was dipping it in her paddle, and holding it up to see if it would string (just as our mother used to do); but she soon had to leave her soap, for the fat woman came out, and they both went to screeching. The squaw could come the panther to a dot, and as we thought, the squaw was enough for the fat woman; soon out came the chap that we knew was not a boy, and made a noise that sounded some like singing; then the cat eyed fellow came in, and they all went in on the screech. This round ended by the old squaws' telling the fortune of the cat-eyed chap and the fat woman.

After sitting there another tedious hour, the triangle went off again; out popped the fiddlers, wiping their mouths as though they had had something wet about them: up went the curtain, and the fat woman came running down the hill. In the back-ground was a human skeleton which the fat woman would run at and howl, and then come back to the lights and cackle and gobble, and then run at the bones again; we don't know how long she would have kept it up, if the cat-eyed fellow had not suddenly made his appearance from behind a clump of trees, and commenced bawling like a newly weaned calf. Soon another fellow made his appearance, which we took to be the fat woman's husband by the way she hid her face and the flutter she was in at being caught with the cat-eyed chap. This new chap commenced roaring; his voice was decidedly bull-froggian. After the usual amount of caterwauling, the cat-eyed chap left, and the fat woman and the new man started for home, crying as loud as they could bawl; they had not gone far, when they got into a row with some other chaps, and in the muss, the woman got the veil knocked off, so that the chap who was with her could see who she was You ought to have seen him double up and howl. You would have been sure that he had the colic and she the St. Vitus dance. The other chaps laughed. That round ended by his dragging the fat woman off from the stage, wriggling and screeching.

After another hour the curtain went up, and there stood the fat woman and we suppose, the husband; he had a dagger, and she evidently considered herself in a bad fix as most females do when they are caught by their husbands; he ran at her several times growling like a hyena, but she made so much noise that he could not stab her, so he put up his dagger; this round ended by some more chaps coming in and fixing things in another shape, which was to kill the cat-eyed chap instead, as appeared in the next round.

When the curtain went up this time, there was a masquerade ball raging on the stage, and one of these girls that can stand on one toe, and throw the other foot higher than her head, was a going it; presently the cat-eyed fellow and the fat woman got out on one side, and were going in on the screech; but they didn't go in long, for the husband found them, and just knifed the cat-eyed chap. Then there was such a time—they all bawled together, and such distressing noises were never heard before. The last we saw of the cat-eyed chap, he was lying there dead, bawling as loud as he could scream; the curtain went down, and the thing was over.

And now, gentle readers, permit us to say that although we have not given you all the details of the performance, you have the substance, and know as much about it as we did when it was over. Friend Holborn, who was with us, purchased a book for forty cents that threw some light on the subject. It seems that it was an American scene, located in Boston and vicinity, and that these foreign mountebanks were giving us a representation of the New England character, and yet we were so stupid as not to see it. It seems that some count (of course there are plenty of counts among the Yankees,) had fallen in love with some big man's wife—and the wife got a touch of it, too—and that she went to this old squaw to get something to cure it. The old squaw recommended roots, and she was off in the woods to get the roots where the cat-eyed fellow happened accidentally to find her, as is generally the case, and as is too often the case for the comfort of such diseased persons, the husband accidentally made his appearance, and the thing finally ended in the husband's administering the only sure remedy in such cases. When we came to learn that they had been trying to represent an American scene, our disgust was intense; we would not have believed, if we had not seen it with our own eyes, that a respectable American audience could have been held together for four hours to listen to such a damnable silly mess of trash sung in a foreign lingo without the slightest approach to harmony; there was but one voice in the whole crowd that cannot be excelled in every church in the land.

So far as operas are concerned, we go in with Parson Hatfield. After all, we are glad we went; we have drawn a lesson from the four hours' misery that we suffered on that occasion that will be of service to us in our downhill of life. We were led to see that the gifts of Providence were not so unequally distributed, after all, although He gives to some wealth and position, He also gives to most of such persons folly and vanity, which entirely destroys the happiness which they might otherwise enjoy. You poor people that sit quietly by your own fireside after the day's work is over, and read the Racine Journal, or the Bible, say your prayers and go to rest, know but little of the agony suffered by those (who think they are rich, at least,) whose whole life is spent in a round of folly, and in making themselves miserable in trying to go somewhere with more clothes on than their neighbors, and do something that nobody else can.

Yes, you had ought to thank God that you don't have to fuss all day to get ready to go the opera and sit four hours in misery, all the while trying to make yourselves believe that you are happy and like it. We say to you that pleasure is more evenly distributed than you imagine.

Some lady friends in Chicago informed us that this was a very poor opera. That was our opinion; we hope the rest of them are better.—Racine Journal.

John Jacob Astor.

His Vast Plan for Colonizing Astoria—A Magnificent Conception.

James Parton, the historian, gives the following account of Astor's greatest operations.

The crowning glory of Mr. Astor's mercantile career was that vast and brilliant enterprise which Washington Irving has commemorated in "Astoria." No other single individual has ever set on foot a scheme so extensive, so difficult and so costly as this; nor has any such enterprise been carried out with such sustained energy and perseverance. To establish a line of trading posts from St. Louis to the Pacific, a four months' journey in a land of wilderness, prairie, mountain and desert, to found a permanent settlement on the Pacific coast as the grand depot of furs and supplies—to arrange a plan by which furs collected should be regularly transported to China, and the ships return to New York, laden with tea and silks, and then proceed once more to the Pacific coast to repeat the circuit—to maintain all parts of this scheme without the expectation of any but a remote profit, sending ship after ship before any certain intelligence of the first ventures had arrived—this was an enterprise which had been memorable if it had been undertaken by a wealthy corporation or powerful government instead of a private merchant, unaided by any resources but his own.

At every moment in the conduct of this magnificent attempt Mr. Astor appears the great man. His parting instructions to the captain of his first ship call to mind those of Gen. Washington to St. Clair on a similar occasion. "All the accidents that have yet happened," said the merchant, "arose from too much confidence in the Indians." The ship was lost a few years after, by the disregard of this last warning. When the news reached New York of the massacre of the crew and blowing up of the ship, the man who flew into a passion at seeing a little boy drop a wine glass behaved with a composure that was the theme of general admiration. He attended the theatre the same evening and entered heartily into the play. Mr. Irving relates that a friend having expressed surprise at this, Mr Astor replied.

"What would you have me do? Would you have me stay at home and weep for what I cannot help?"

This was not indifference: for when, after nearly two years of weary waiting, he heard of the safety and success of the overland expedition, he was so overjoyed that he could scarcely contain himself.

"I felt ready," said he, "to fall upon my knees in a transport of gratitude."

A touch in one of his letters shows the absolute confidence he felt in his own judgment and abilities, a confidence invariably exhibited by men of the first executive talent:

"Were I on the spot," he wrote to one of his agents when the affairs of the settlement appeared desperate, "and had the management of affairs, I would defy them all; but, as it is, everything depends on you and the friends about you. Our enterprise is grand, and deserves success, and I hope in God it will meet it. If my object were merely gain of money, I should say 'think whether it is best to save what we have and abandon the place;' but the thought like a dagger to my heart."

He intimates here that his object was not merely "gain of money." what was it then?

Mr. Irving informs us that it was the desire of fame. We should rather say that when nature endows a man with a remarkable gift, also implants within him the love of exercising it. Astor loved to plan a vast, far-reaching enterprise. He loved it as Morphy loved to play chess, as Napoleon loved to plan a campaign, as Raphael loved to paint, and Handel to compose.

The war of 1812 foiled the enterprise. "But for that war," Mr. Astor used to say, "I should have been the richest man that ever lived." He expected to go on spending money for several years and then to gain a steady annual profit of millions. It was, however, that very war that enabled him to sustain the enormous losses of the enterprise without injury to his estate, or even a momentary inconvenience. During the first year of the war he had the luck to receive two or three cargoes of tea from China, despite the British cruisers. In the second year of the war, when the government was reduced to borrow at 80, he invested largely in the loan, which, one year after the peace, stood at 120.

Meerschaum.

This is a German word and means sea-foam, that is, the color of the sea-foam. The idea that the pipes of that name are made out of sea foam, or anything like it, is erroneous. Meerschaum is a mineral, proper, found in the serpentine or magnesian rock. It occurs chiefly at the head of the Mediterranean, where it is dug out of its native bed, and sent to Europe in blocks or rude pipes. It is of a white or whitish color. The brown or reddish cast is obtained by saturating them with oil or wax. Meerschaum is composed of flint, silex, magnesia and carbon—the carbon and flint in an oxidized state. It is soft and porous. Its porosity gives it its properties as a pipe, absorbing by it the poisonous qualities of the smoke. It is, however, inferior to a clay pipe in this respect; but better than the briar pipe, which is next to it. There is one fault with the meerschaum pipe—the bowl is too short. Tobacco itself is an absorber of the poisonous qualities of the smoke—and when the smoke passes through tobacco—as it will in a long bowl, the column of tobacco in it being long—it will become purified precisely the way it does in a cigar. The first half of the cigar affords harmless smoking, the latter half less and less so, till the poisoned stump remains. So with tobacco in the bowl of a pipe. A long bowl puts it in the form of a cigar. The first smoking is the best (as every smoker knows is the case with pipe-smoking), especially if the distance through the tobacco is great. One should always stop smoking when the tobacco is half out. The remainder is permeated by the poison—and in that is the hurt we get from smoking.

—Notwithstanding the fact that the glittering issues of the Mint but rarely dazzle the eyes of the general public in these days, it is stated in the late report of the Director, that from the organization of the institution and its branches, in 1793, up to the 30th of last month, they coined altogether, in gold, silver, copper and nickel, nearly nine hundred and six millions of pieces, of the total value of over five hundred and twenty-three and a half million of dollars.

—In McGregor, Iowa, recently, a little child of John L. Davis, by some means unknown to its parents, got a box containing some five or six pills, which it swallowed. In a few minutes after it fell into convulsions, which terminated in death in the course of half an hour.

From the Albany Evening Journal.

"The Love Life of Dr. Kane."

When a short time since, the announcement was made that Dr. Kane, the famous Arctic explorer, had before his death, secretly wedded Miss Margaret Fox, one of the noted sisters connected with the so-called "spiritual" knocking in Rochester it was immediately denied as "a canard" and "a calumny," apparently by instigation of relatives, who were interested in the memory of the deceased. Then came an assertion that the fact would shortly be established by sufficient evidence. Now that evidence is furnished, in the form of a considerable volume, published by Carleton, of New York, called "The Love Life of Dr. Kane."

This volume consists mainly of fervid amatory epistles, tied together by slender comments, and coupled with a narrative of the circumstances that prompted their presentation in this public form. These are briefly stated thus: The Doctor met Margaret in Philadelphia, as a spirit-rapping medium, when she was only fifteen, and while he was engaged in preparation for his last voyage to the Polar regions. It was a case of love at first sight. Struck by the remarkable beauty of the girl, and by her apparent artlessness and innocence, he sought an acquaintance which at once ripened into mutual intimacy. Having the sympathy with the peculiar, and, as he termed it, "ambiguous" life she was leading, he early advised her to abandon it, and having secured her consent to do so, proposed to her an engagement, conditioned upon her endeavor to obtain a suitable education, and upon his successful return from the hazardous venture he was about to make. Under his auspices, she was placed in a private school in Philadelphia.

When Dr. Kane returned in 1855, the lovers were to have been married. But his relatives opposed, on account of the "obscure" origin of the girl and she released him. He sought her again, however, and the engagement was renewed upon condition that it should be kept secret until the publication of the Doctor's report. In 1856, an illness initiated in the Arctic region became developed, and his physicians ordered him to Europe. Before going he was secretly married to Miss Fox. When he died, he left her five thousand dollars, in a private trust.

Statements discreditable to Margaret were circulated; Dr. Kane's book appeared, and produced an immense income, and the widow sued for dower, in order to secure her rights. One hundred and thirty four letters from the Doctor became embodied in her memoir. It is alleged that in order to prevent the promulgation of these an arrangement was made with the family, which has since been violated, and that the failure to carry out the terms of compromise made it necessary for Mrs. Kane to take the papers from the hands of a trustee, and give them to the world.

So far as the case of the plaintiff is concerned, it seems to be abundantly established. We can see no reason to doubt, in view of the facts presented, that she was a legal wife, and that she has been very wrongfully persecuted. An undeveloped trusting girl, she put herself in the hands of a noble man, who loftily designed to bring her intelligence and her social qualities up to his standard, and then to couple her destiny with his own. His untimely fate prevented the fulfillment of this, as of other great designs that occupied his mind. But when death stared him in the face, he did all he could. He gave her his name. He gave her the right to claim the privileges which resulted from their espousals, and from the fact that for years she was his and he was hers. This fact ought to have been recognized and admitted. There is something puerile and disgusting to the American mind, in the attempt to ostracise a helpless girl,—even to heap obloquy upon her,—because she was not born in the charmed circle of a certain class.

But there is an element which will give this book a more palatable flavor to the gourmand public. It gratifies the appetite for knowledge of the inside life of great men. We see the actors upon the stage; we watch them in their made-up habits; we look upon their studied parts—but that is nothing to satisfy. What are they behind the scenes, in the green-room, in the familial and unconstrained conduct of their daily lives? Did Napoleon desert the palace of the Tuileries to hold a chit-chat with a flower girl? Did the Duke of Wellington have a back-door admission to "castellated halls" that less favored subjects would be proud to enter in front? Did Lord Palmerston wait long years for Lady Cowper, when she was another man's wife? Upon such pregnant questions often hinges an intensity of interest that the fortunes of Empires fail to excite.

We find here, certainly food enough for this temperament. A man whose fame was in everybody's mouth; who has crossed his knees under a Queen's mahagany; who was on familiar terms with Presidents and Senators; who stood before audiences numbered by thousands; whose deeds were the wonder of continents, met a simple girl, sitting at a window in a room which all were free to enter, and engaged in a mountebank enterprise. Instantly the heart's affections of his imperial nature were enthralled. He became the slave of a passion he could not master. The man who faced Arctic winters without a tremor—who looked unblanched upon dangers the mention of which appalled millions—gazed into the face of a little black-eyed miss of fifteen, and instantly acknowledged his sovereign.

And now we see the all-potent power of that mysterious passion the world calls love. Here is a heart flaming from the tip of a pen—a soul unburdened in the pages of manuscript. We find that the great man, strong in everything else, was weak in this. The new attachment of his life was its one absorbing ambition; and yet he dared not acknowledge it. He felt that he could not be happy without its object, but dreaded to encounter the rage of relatives, and the scorn of a foolish world. He was proud of his own fame and position; but accounted all worthless unless "Tutie" smiled. He summoned her to give proof of nobility and dignity of character; then proposed clandestine meetings, at the impropriety of which even she revolted. He undertook to break the intimacy which held them with a spell; but when Maggie treated him with indifference, lent all the energies of his ardent nature to win her back again. He was ashamed to introduce her to his relatives; yet rode openly with her, declared to others that she should be his wife, and when he thought she smiled on those whom he disliked, gave vent to his jealous rage in blasphemies. At one hour he was talking learned philosophy with the President; the next, he was writing sentimental and execrable poetry to "Darling Pet." He hastened from the society of savans, to pick out a fashionable bonnet for "charming, incomprehensible Mag." Upon the threshold of the Arctic zone, he looked back to remember with gushing emotion the dark-eyed maiden who held his heart, in a Pennsylvania boarding-school.

This pretty girl, whose beautiful face makes a handsome embellishment for the frontispiece, never seems to have developed a depth of love which was equal to its object. But this did not deter him. He was faithful, if she was not. He would write though her pen remained idle. True as the needle to the pole, he followed the guidance of his captivated heart, and died with the chains of his singular passion unbroken by him.

This is a strange, uncommon story. It will take a first rank, for many years, among the literary and social romances of the world; Such writers as Mrs. Henry Wood and Miss Braddon may find in it material for scores of novels. And yet, none of them can tell the story more graphically, more entertainingly, than it is set forth in these epistles, that brim with the deep emotions of their author, sometimes noble, sometimes weird, sometimes grotesque, but always permeated by an evidently mastering love that swept upon and governed every attribute of his being. Such a tale needs no extraneous or meretricious adornments to give it value and interest in the minds of a large majority of readers.

A Stuttering Youth Commits Suicide for Unrequited Love.

An inquest was held yesterday afternoon, at the house of William Brett, No. 75 Market street, by Coroner Collin, on the body of Alfred Frederick Keenan, whose death was the result of taking a dose of laudanum for the purpose of self-destruction. Keenan was a man of good habits, and quite temperate, and had been in the employ of Mr. Brett for the last four years. He had a very bad impediment in his speech, which to a certain extent, prevented his going into society. On Monday last he put $20 in his pocket and started out for the purpose of finding a physician who could cure his stammering. Keenan did not succeed in his search and returned home much disheartened and depressed in spirits. He was paying attentions to a young lady, Miss Bella Scullen, to whom he was most devotedly attached, but who, it would seem, did not sufficiently reciprocate his affection. He wrote a very touching letter to this lady just previous to his death. On Wednesday night, Keenan came home as usual, and retired for the night He swallowed a quantity of laudanum and stretched himself on a bench in his room, and he was found dead in this position, next morning. Dr. Thomas Robinson made a post mortem examination of the deceased's body, and found a quantity of tincture of opium in the stomach, which was the cause of death. A verdict of "death by suicide, by taking laudenum," was rendered by the jury.

The following is a copy of the letter alluded to above:

TUESDAY.

BELLA! BELLA! BELLA!

Good-bye! Good bye! Oh, think of me when you pray at night—me, the poor suicide, that had only one hope or wish in this poor world, and that wish was to see you happy. Oh Bella! Bella! my last dying wish is that you will marry somebody far better than I am; but oh, Bella, you will not forget me; for, oh, Bella, I loved you, and if it is permitted that the spirits of those departed may watch over the welfare of dear ones in this world, I will watch over you and perhaps we may meet in the better and purer life that is to come. I wish you to keep the gloves and the ring that you will find in this, for my sake; and when you are happy in some other man's love, oh! breathe a trifling prayer for the poor miserable suicide, whose only wish, whose only dying thought was of your happiness. So farewell! a long and last farewell. The only wish I can express is that you will press one loving kiss on my brow when I am dead—no cold worldly kiss, but a kiss of sympathy, for one who loved you. Good bye! may all the blessed angels watch over and guard you. FRED.

(Oh! if I could only kiss you before I die.)

Perhaps what few clothes I have may pay for burrying me, if not, pitch me out into the street and let me be buried as I have lived—a dog—but never forget, that for four years you have had an English gentleman living in your house. FRED.

"See that the note to Bella Soullen is delivered at once, for if it is not, it will not be imaginary creaking boots that will be heard on the landing."

Deceased was twenty-two years of age, and a native of England. He was an occasional contributor to the columns of the Sunday Mercury.—N. Y. World.

A NICE OBITUARY.—The New York Citizen Miles O'Reilly's organ, gives the great English pugilist the following pleasant parting notice:

"The head of the human carnivora is dead. For eleven years he exercised himself in drawing blood and sponging himself, and one of his contestants made almost an historic tableau. We allude to Tom Sayers, a fellow whose animal life has been excused under the appellation of 'game;' but who seems to have been as savage in the lasser as well as the greater manifestations of life—abusing his wife, drinking a great deal of beer, and showing his muscles in a circus for so much a week. Such men subserve no economy in nature until they die. They have not the desperate bravery of the dog, since they are trained to harm the most with the least loss; and as to the theory that they are apostles of self-defense, we think a revolver is much more effective."

MRS. MARY, wife of the Archbishop of Downs, accidentally set fire to her dress in the drawing room of her house in Hillsboro, and before assistance could be rendered, was so dreadfully burned that she expired on the night of the 3d ult. A London weekly paper of the 13th ult., chronicled three more deaths by fire and crinoline.

PERSONAL.

ONE of the four sons of Robert Burns, Lt. Col. James Glencairn Burns, called so after his father's friend, Lord Glencairn, who obtained for him a commission in the British army, died at Cheltenham on the 19th in his 82d year. In 1859, when Lt. Col. Burns took an active part in the Burns centenary, he made an indelible impression on the public by his venerable appearance, and his striking resemblance to the Scottish bard. Lt. Col. Burns leaves one brother. Among the living descendents of Burns are Mrs. Everett of Belfast, daughter of the poet's son Robert, who died in 1858.

THE widow of Iturbide, former Emperor in New York, the Broadway Tabernacle have granted him leave of absence for one year. They pay his expenses, supply the pulpit, and increase his salary to $5,000.

IT is stated that as the emperor Napoleon III is forbidden by his physician to smoke he is distributing his fine collection of meerschaum pipes among his friends. His favorite costume in his study consists of an old patelot, well worn and remarkably shabby.

GEN. LOGAN, notwithstanding previous reports, has not yet accepted the Mexican Ministership, and it is the impression of his friends that he will decline the position.

THE Hon. Thomas Corwin was struck with paralysis at a dinner party on the evening of the 15th in Washington, and now lies in a critical condition.

THE firm of Grant & Perkins at Galena, Illinois, in the hide and leather business was dissolved on the 1st of December by the withdrawal of the senior partner—Mr. J. R. Grant, father of Ulysses. Mr. O. L. Grant, brother of the General, also leaves the firm, and will establish himself in Chicago.

THE late Mr. Thackeray had a nose of a most peculiar shape, as may be seen by his portrait. The bridge was very low, and the nostrils extremely well developed. On one occasion at a party where Douglass Jerrold was present, it was mentioned that Mr. Thackeray's religious opinions were unsettled and that a lady of his acquaintance was doing her best to convert him to Romanism. "To Romanism?" said Jerrold; "Let us hope she'll begin with his nose."

THE Hon. Amos Kendall, Postmaster General under Jackson, is building in Washington a house of worship, the "Calvary Baptist church," at a cost of seventy-five thousand dollars, which he proposes to give to the society of the church on condition that when completed, they will furnish it.

THREE remarkable widows are living in New York. The first is Mrs. John J. Crittenden, tall, handsome, stately, in splendid health, and always magnificently dressed. The second is Mrs. Daniel Webster, not so well preserved nor so young, but still a noticeable lady. The last is Mrs. Maj. Gen. Philip Kearney, a magnificent woman in respect to appearance, with much natural beauty, and a good deal more that is artificial.

A FREQUENT confounding of names, calls for the explanation that Edward Henry Rollins, member of Congress from New Hampshire, and Edward Ashton Rollin, of New Hampshire, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, are not only distinct persons, but are not even related. Both have been prominent in the politics of the state, and both have been Speaker of the State Legislature. The Congressman lives in Concord, and is a druggist by profession. The Commissioner lives at Great Falls, and is a lawyer.

TOM SAYERS died of consumption at forty caused purely by hard drinking. Of the large sums of money he has received since his fight with Heenan, he leaves but twenty or thirty thousand dollars to his children.

GEN. GRANT's pay as Lieutenant General amounts to $9,940 per annum. With a house in Galena, one in Washington, and another in Philadelphia, we don't see how he manages to make both ends meet especially when we remember that eggs are forty-five cents a dozen, and butter about sixty cents a pound. There is only one way to account for it, and that is that Mrs. Grant must be a very economical housekeeper.

MR. CAMERON, the English ambassador, is still retained as a captive by the Emperor of Abyssinia. His majesty declines to release him on the grounds that Great Britian by her influence in Egypt might have averted the trouble between the viceroy and Theodorus, and threatens now to keep poor Mr. Cameron in durance vile until Lord Russell has succeeded in preventing Egypt from annoying Abyssinia.

EX-GOV. CLARK of Mississippi, who was a conspicuous rebel, lately wrote a very temperate reply to an invitation to address the legislature of that state, in which he said of the national flag: "With all of you I marched under that flag in a foreign land, and it was victorious. With all of you I marched against it at home, and again it was victorious. It again waves over us, our flag, and may it ever be victorious." Amen.

LOUIS NAPOLEON was so much afraid of the popularity which the Orleans family might derive from funeral orations at the grave of Dupin, the devoted friend of Louis Philippe and of the heir to his throne, that his majesty strictly prohibited all demonstrations.

THE Rev. R. J. Breckenridge, D. C., has declined to accept the Presidency of Washington and Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, to which he was elected last summer.

THE WEAKER SEX.—The weaker sex! Emile Villars bids the world ponder on the old verdict. He has made his calculations. He speaks the inexorable logic of facts. When an average lady begins her toilet in the morning she weighs something between 75 and 80 pounds. A frail feeble creature is this; a tender flower; a sample of the weaker and prescouted sex. Wait! Let the reader reflect. She will carry, before she is completely equipped for the Bois de Boulogne, ninety-five parts of textile fabrics of various qualities and weights, from lawn to velvet. Then follow the flower, the bonnet, studded with steel ornaments. And now for jewelry and decorations of all kinds, combs, diadems, bandelettes, chains, buckles, necklace, earrings, false hair, fillettes, powder, paint, high heeled boots! Mt. Emile Villars, in brief, has calculated the weight the "weaker sex" easily carries, on summer afternoons, to the Bois, in the shape of toilette. This weight is, he tells us, a little more than 18 pounds—exactly the weight of a cuirassier, breastplated. His breastplate the carbineer bears only on horseback; whereas the weaker sex dances under her load. Simple folks visiting the Tower have wondered how the brave men of old bore and fought in the massive armor on show there, how much greater should they wonder to see the "weaker sex" dancing under the weight of a modern beauty's complete costume.

AN Irishman fell in love with a lady, but she, instead of reciprocating his affections, fell in love with another man and married him, which caused Pat to exclaim in the fulness of his heart; "Och, would that you had been born twins so that I could hav had half of you."

The Science of Health!

Every Man his own Physician.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS, AND HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

Disorders of the stomach, Liver & Bowels.

The Stomach is the great centre which influences the health or the disease of the system—Abused or debilitated by excess—indigestion, offensive breath and physical prostration are the natural consequences. Allied to the brain. It is the source of headaches, mental depression, nervous complaints and unrefreshing sleep. The liver becomes affected and generates billous disorders, pains in the side &c. The Bowels sympathize by Costiveness, Diarrhoea and Dysentry The principal action of these Pillals on the stomach, and the liver, lungs, bowels and kidneys participate in their recuperative and regenerative operation.

Erysipelas and Salt Rheum.

Are two of the most common and virulent disorders prevalent on this sontinent, to these the Ointment is especially antagonistic its "modus operandi" is first to eradicate the venom and then complete the cure.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Uncers.

Cases of many years' standing, that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions on the Skin.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic diseases, are eradicated and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliences in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Female Complaints.

Whether in the young or old, married or single, at the dawn of Womanhood, or the turn of life, these tonic medicines di play so decided an influence that a makred improvement is soon preceptible in the health of the patient. Being a purely vegetable preparation, they are safe and reliable remedy for all classes of famales in every condition of health and station of life.

Piles and Fistula

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emoitent; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healing qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills should be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Mercurial Eruptions,	Swelled Glands
Sprains,	Burns,	Piles.
Sore Legs,	Stiff Joints.	Chapped Hands

These Bitters are prepared, in pure Bourbon Whiskey, from a combination of over twenty different kinds of roots, barks and herbs, which act in perfect concert one with other, prepared from the original formula given by the great chief, Red Jacket, to Dr. Chapin, who used them successfully in his practice for many years, and by their use gained so great a popularity in the treatment and cure of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Constipation, Sick and Nervous Headache, Fever and Ague, and all diseases arising from torpid liver or indigestion. Persons suffering from either of these loathsome diseases will find a sure cure by the use of those Bitters, which are perfectly pure and free from all those drugs and poisons usually put up in such preparations and palmed off on an unsuspecting public. A single trial will convince the most skeptical that in the RED JACKET there is virtue which no other Bitters possess.

They strengthen and invigorate the system.
They are unequaled for general debility.
They are a sure cure for dyspepsia.
They give a good and healthy appetite.
They assist digestion.
They are the best stimulant in existence.
They are a preventive of Fever and Ague.
They relieve constipation.
They cure Nervous Headache.
They are perfectly pure and palatable

Aged persons and delicate females will find they can save large doctor's bills by the use of these Bitters.

Beware of counterfeits. The Red Jacket Bitters, are only sold in bottles with our name blown on the side, and our private government stamp across the cork. —OUR—

For Medicinal and Table uses, which are perfectly pure, and need only be tried to be appreciated. None genuine unless they have our gold label on each bottle, and our initials pressed in wax over the cork.

Sold by all druggists and dealers throughout the country. Call for our goods and take no other.

A BIG SWINDLE.—Swindlers and rogues are not all dead yet. One day last week a Mr. Wm. H. Lessig passed a forged check for $500 at the National Bank. As he was unknown to the cashier, he procured Mr. Charles Bidwell, who had previously known him in the army, to identify him. Mr. Bidwell went to the Bank and did so and upon being asked by the cashier "to underwrite," he inadvertently put his name to the check, never dreaming that it amounted to an indorsment, but supposing that he signed his name simply as an identifying witness. As soon as Mr. Bidwell ascertained that the check was a forgery, he dispatched a constable after the rogue, who overtook and arrested him at Coldwater and he is now safely lodged in the Adrian jail. The same scamp on the day previous passed a hundred dollar check upon Mr. John Clark of Clinton, and it has since transpired, that he has passed checks for a large amount at W. H. Stones Bank in Adrian, in Sturgis and Charlotte, and perhaps at other places in the State.

The convention will be open for business, at 10 o'clock Wednesday forenoon at the Church; but a preliminary service will be held the previous evening, and a sermon delivered by Rev. C. W. Knickerbacker.

CHRISTMAS AT RIDGEWAY.—Christmas day was not forgotten even in Ridgeway. The Sabbath School children were called together at the M. E. Church, to see the Gift Tree, gotten up for them and richly laden with the fruit peculiar to such trees. The house was densely crowded with expectant children and curious adults. After a few short and appropriate remarks by Messrs. Davidson, Gray, Hough, Lowe and Rev. Donaldson, interspersed with music by the school and choir, the gifts were distributed, greatly to the gratification of the children and many of the elders. The opportunity for friends to surprise each other with pretty gifts was duly improved. The tree was beautiful, considering the very short time in which it was prepared.—Albums, Scarfs, Furs, Baskets, Books, Dolls, Trumpets and toys of all descriptions were swinging from every bough.—Dress patterns, Shoes and stockings and a Bonnet were sent where they will be greatfully received. The Pastor was bountifully supplied with Turkeys, and one or two other valuable gifts. One gentleman who "couldn't quite understand where the gift came from" discovered "the hero" in time to slip a greenback into an envelop and direct to his wife and daughter. We hope "Santa Claus" will remember him next year.—Altogether it was a success and showe Ridgeway is not to be excelled by neighboring towns even in Christmas trees.

God has been blessing the people spiritually of late and many souls are enquiring the way to Christ. May the good work go on.

A BUSY WEEK AT ST. PETERS.—We gave notice, in our last issue, of the visitation of Bishop McCrosky, to St. Peters Church—confirming five candidates, on Monday evening 18th, and ordaining Rev. J. Wainwright Ray to the Priesthood, on Tuesday morning 19th.

On Thursday the annual renting of the Pews took place, which resulted in raising on them, about the amount of the Rectors salary. On Thursday and Friday the Ladies and Gentlemen were engaged in trimming the Church for Christmas, and put it in most tasteful array, adorned as a bride for the bridegroom.—Sunday evening was of peculiar interest, for, in addition to the usual Christmas eve service and sermon, there was a tableau, which, with the beauty of the decorations, drew so many people together, that many went away unable to gain, even a standing.

On Christmas day, the Church services for the Holy Nativity were observed, on which occasion the newly ordained Rector consecrated the elements for the first time, and administered the Holy communion. The evening of Christmas was observed by a Sunday School Festival, in which large numbers of the Episcopal society met with the Sunday School to enjoy the Festivities of a well spread Table. The Hall was tastily trimmed and lighted, and good cheer reigned throughout.

MICHIGAN STATE CANE GROWERS ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of the Michigan State Cane Growers Association, will be held at Flint, Genesee Co., commencing Tuesday, January 16th, 7 o'clock P. M. and continue through the 17th and 18th. The Genesee Co. Agricultural Society has made ample arrangements for the meeting, and donated liberally, enabling the Association to offer liberal premiums to be paid at this meeting.

The Michigan State Agricultural Society also offer liberal premiums, subject to their published terms, to be awarded at the same time.

This will be the most important meeting ever held by this Association, and will be open to all the States. It is expected that a bountiful supply of the products of the cane will be on exhibition and it is hoped there will be large delegations from all parts worthy of the business we are engaged in. The Ladies, being good judges of sweets, are cordially invited to attend in mass. Mr. Clough, editor of the Sorgo Journal, has been invited and is expected to deliver an address at this meeting.

ALEXANDER RICHARD, Secretary. WM. TAFT, President.

END OF THE HANSON AND OLCOTT LAW SUIT.—Five years ago Hanson sued Olcott before a Justice of Washtenaw county: The matter in difference between them was this: Hanson held a note against Olcott; Olcott claimed that he had paid Hanson $20 to apply on the note which H. denied of receiving.

then taken to the Circuit Court where it was tried twice; from there it went to the Supreme Court upon a writ of error the judgement reversed and it was sent back to the Circuit again where under a rule of the Court, by consent of the parties, it was finally submitted to Dr. Johnathan R. Bowers a Justice at Moreville for arbitration.

After a trial lasting three days it was submitted to the arbitrator on the 27th inst. The entire costs and expenses of this somewhat celebrated case from the commencement will not fall far short of $2000. The award has not yet been made.

L. D. Norris Esq. of Ypsilanti conducted the trial for the plantiff, G. R. Palmer of Lake Ridge, assisted by P. M. Eaton, for the defendant.

This case furnishes quite an example for uncompromising litigants.

Died,

In this village, December 30th, 1865, OLMSTED HOUGH, in the 68th year of his age.

Mr. Hough was born in Columbia county, New York, and was elected a member of the New York Assembly from Herkimer county, in 1830. Mr. Hough became an active leader of the Democratic party in this section from the time that he first became a citizen of Michigan in '33, and was one of the first State Senators elected after Michigan was admitted into the Union. He was Sheriff of Lenawee county for two successive terms, and was for several years Supervisor of this township.

In this village, Jan. 1st, at ten minutes before nine o'clock, P. M., MISS LUCY E. EDDY, aged 23 years and 30 days.

After a lingering illness of eleven months, and sufferings of the most intense and excruciating character, she has finally been released from her pains and trials by a kind and merciful Providence and transported to that Heavenly home where "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." During all her long and wearisome sickness, she endured her pains with the greatest fortitude and resignation never once murmuring at her lot but trusting in her Heavenly Father with the firmest faith and most implicit confidence, ever saying "Thy will, not mine, be done.

Often did she repeat the words of the sacred writer "The cup that my Father giveth me: shall I not drink it?" In her death, a widowed mother has lost a dutiful and confiding daughter: an only sister, the best of sisters: and a large circle of acquaintances a universal favorite and firm and everlasting friend.

THE HOLIDAYS.—Another Christmas has past, another year has flown. The visits of Santa Claus the brim full stockings, the beautiful gifts, the social parties, the luscious dinners and all the merry making of the holidays are gone. The year 1865 with its joys and sorrows, its successes and defeats, its wars and pestilence has breathed its last, and the new year now steps upon the stage of time, to perform its brief part in the great drama of the universe, and form an eventful chapter in the world's history.

Tecumseh has had her full share of the pleasure of Holiday week. The Episcopalians and Presbyterians each got up a Christmas festival and supper both of which passed off very pleasantly.

At the Universalist Church a Christmas tree was arranged for the amusement of the little folks, which contained also some valuable presents for the older ones among which was a purse of $150, for the pastor of the society Rev. H. L. Hayward.

The Masonic Fraternity had a grand jubilee during the week, in Masonic and Bidwell's Hall. All the delicacies of the season were there found in profusion including both Masons and Masons wives.

The Carter Zouave Troupe favored us with a call and a very creditable performance too. Those who attended were agreeably disappointed and those who did not attend had good cause to regret it.

Incidents and Accidents.

A terrible scene was witnessed in Ann St., New York on last Tuesday morning, as a man all on fire and frantic from pain was seen rushing into the street. It appears that Mr. R. Crawford, who was employed in the oil and paint store of Messrs. G. and S. Crawford, 42, Ann street, went into the vault under the store to get a small quantity of benzine, when the fluid took fire from a lighted lamp which he carried in his hand and exploded. The burning benzine was scattered upon his face and clothing, and the flames soon covered nearly his entire body. Crawford losing his self-possession, rushed into the street, was soon followed by a crowd, and had to be knocked down, so as to cover him and subdue the flames. He was rolled into the gutter, and the flames were extinguished. The poor fellow was taken to the store, where his body was found to be terribly burned. Medical assistance was procured, and hopes of his recovery are entertained by his friends.

Some fellows who tried to rob a hen-roost in Winsted, Conn., found when they went to go out, that the door had blown too, and fastened them in. Between $2,500 and $3,000 was found in his possession, the most of which is believed to have been abstracted from letters.

Two gentlemen coming down Washington street, Norwich Conn., met a lady whose bonnet was all on fire. The lady was blissfully unconscious of the conflagration until her attention was called to it by one of the gentlemen. How it caught is of course a mystery, but it was probably from a spark. The fire was extinguished as soon as it reached the waterfall.

About 9 o'clock on Saturday evening last the wife of Thomas Mullany, a coal miner, living in the town of Hemlock, Pennsylvania undertook to pour carbon oil from a vessel containing about a quart, into a lighted coal lamp when both vessels exploded, setting fire to the woman's clothing, as well as other clothing lying near her which she had been ironing. Mrs. M. in her fright ran into another room where her husband and four children were asleep in bed. Mr. M. awakened by her screams, sprang from his bed opened the door and induced her to leave the house enveloped in a flame of fire which those who witnessed it declare ascended to the height of fifteen feet. The woman ran screaming and plunged into a pool of water and thus succeeded in extinguishing the fire from the remnants of garments attached to her person. In the meantime, Mr. M., by superhuman efforts, succeeded in quelling the flames in the house and saving his four children from a horrible death. The unfortunate woman lingered until six o'clock on Monday, when death relieved her of her sufferings.

A young man named Hershman, clerk in a railroad office in Pittsburgh, charged a well-known citizen with taking his pocket-book. The charge not being sustained, he was committed in default of bail for perjury. While there he took poison and wrote a most plaintive letter to his young and beautiful wife, concluding with the following note:

"To my cell mates: After I am dead, take out my front teeth, which are artificial, and give them to my wife—the one for whom I have died."

A prompt application of the stomach pump was made, and he still keeps those "front teeth."

On the evening of the 23d, as Bishop Rosecrans of Ohio was going to his home at the Catholic Seminary near Sedansville, he was accosted by two men, who demanded his money. He made no reply, but hastened his pace to a run. One of the men then drew a pistol and fired at him, the ball taking effect in the left leg, just above the knee. Even this did not stop the Bishop, who succeeded in making good his escape. The wound, upon examination, proved to be merely one of the flesh, and although painful, is by no means serious. No clue has yet been obtained to the perpetrators of the outrage.

GLEANINGS.

—The city of Mexico has a population of 250,000, of which only 50,000 are gentlemen or merchants; the rest are Indians or Lepors, who throng the streets as fruit-sellers, venders of small wares, water and pack carriers, etc., etc. There is a great display of fine carriages and elegant equipages. The houses of the wealthy are most barbaric in splendor. The ladies at the opera dress very elegantly, with a profusion of jewelry. No lady wears a bonnet. An elegant mantilla is thrown over the head.

—A young man named Parson S. Paramour was fined five dollars for saying he would be d—d on the streets of Indianapolis, last Friday.

—The advocates of a prohibitory liquor law in Canada, are urging what is called the "Dunkin Act," similar to the "Maine Law." The "voice of the people" is taken upon its adoption, and in many places the majority is largely against it. At Puslinch, Wellington county, recently, after an overwhelming negative vote, the villagers had a grand blow-out, and burned the projector of the law in effigy.

—Audubon's "Birds of America" was produced in 1840, it being then pronounced "the most magnificent monument ever raised by art to natural science." A few years since copies could be purchased for from $400 to $500. Now a well bound copy will cost $1,500. Only one hundred copies were printed.

At Manass Junction the fortifications have almost entirely disappeared—a scarcely distinguishable line alone marks their existence. At Bristow, the graves of the fallen are leveled with the ground, and the ties of the long line of stockades from Duke's Station to the Rapidan, have been made into railroad ties. From Alexandria to Culpepper, however, the country is still barren—almost a desert, but at Orange Court House, new houses are springing up, and fences fill the places of those destroyed.

—An experiment tried by an eminent physician of St. Petersburg, during the prevalence of the cholera there several years ago serves to illustrate the influence of the mind upon the body. He obtained of the authorities two criminals who had been condemned to death, to do with them as he thought fit. One of these convicts was made to sleep in a bed, in which he was told, a man died with the cholera but the night before—although such was not the fact. After a restless night, the criminal was taken with all the symptoms of cholera, and died of that disease, declaring that he had caught it from the bed—a victim to his own fears. The other was made to sleep on a bed whereon a man had died a few hours previously of the fatal disease. This fact however, was unknown to the occupant of the bed, who awoke in the morning refreshed by his sleep, remaining in perfect health.

—A new and frightfully literal translation of the New Testament has been printed, in which John the Baptist is styled "John the Dipper." Another specimen is: "Neither do men light a lamp and put it under a corn-measure, but on a lamp stand, and it giveth light to all who are in the family." This new version, the Springfield Republican suggests, might suit that rustic minister who, in a hot controversy against immersion, took for his text, "Be not carried about with divers."

—The citizens of Rushville, Illinois, have subscribed ninety odd thousand dollars for the suppression of the liquor traffic in that town!

—The most inspired and distinguished of the New York hair dressers has introduced the custom of dressing the hair of his lovely customers, by adding and blending with the natural growth tresses of false hair. This is, perhaps, no new thing, but the novelty of the present fashion rests in the fact that there is no wish to match the natural hair with the false, but the contrary—locks of yellow are intermixed with the dark hair of the brunette, while the blonde's golden tresses are striped with black. This unique style is called the Zebra, and it is expected that it will be a great success.

—A strike of a peculiar character has occurred in Belgium, which has brought the desired change. The consumers of oysters by some agreement, decided from a certain day to commence a strike, and eat no more of the dainty fish till the price was lowered. The effect was magical. In a few days the stock of oysters had increased to an alarming extent, and the proprietors of the fisheries were right glad to give way.

—The winter has seen a new fashion in ladies' dress inaugurated in Paris. It consists in havin the great coats which, in imitation of the men, are now worn fabricated partly of one color, partly of another—the body, for example, being black, and the sleeves blue. At first view, the contrast of the colors in one garment seems strange, but improves on being looked at, and the fashion, consequently, will probably become general.

—A curious and cruel way of cooking turtles appears in a Chinese cookery book. The turtle is placed in a vessel of water on the fire, with a lid over it having an aperture of such size and so arranged that the turtle can just get his head out, and within the reach of highly spiced wine. As the temperature of the water increases, so does his thirst, and he gradually goes on drinking the seasoned fluid until the heat kills him, by which time his whole system has become impregnated with the vino-aromatic seasoning, and a flavor, described as delicious, is imparted to the flesh.

British capitalists furnish the money for building this road and have the controlling interest in it. Their object is to reach the settlement of the Hudson Bay company, and ultimately to extend the road to the valley of the Saskatchawan river, and from thence to the Frazer river gold regions and the Pacific. These capitalists will construct a road down the river from St. Paul to Winona. Mr. W. B. Ogden, on the part of the Northwestern Railroad company, has signed an agreement on the part of that road to have their line extended to Winona by the time the road from St. Paul to Winona is completed. It is contemplated that both these roads will be completed and in successful operation within the next two years.

—The Madison Journal gives a fearful story of hydrophobia at Waterloo, Wis., upon the authority of Henry Drew, assistant superintendent of public property. It says: Some six or seven years ago a mad dog went through the village of Waterloo, Jefferson county, and bit a number of animals. Among others, it snapped at the leg of a cow belonging to Mr. Babcock. The animal was examined, but no mark was found, and it was supposed that it had escaped being bitten. The animal was afterwards sold to a man by the name of Garrison, who used her milk freely, as did two of his children. Some of the neighbors, including Mr. Drew's family, were also supplied with the milk of this cow. At different times during the time since the cow was bitten, there has been inexplicable and fatal sickness among those using her milk, and two children of Mr. Garrison's, two of Mr. Drew's, and two others, have been attacked with spasms, and died in great agony. Mr. Garrison has also been attacked at times with spasms. The mystery of this sickness was solved by the death, with every symptom of hydrophobia, a short time ago, of the cow so slightly bitten seven years ago, and in whose system madness had been latent ever since. The case is a singular one and worthy the attention of scientific men.

—An editor of a temperance paper once wrote a long, dull leader. It had no caption. When the compositor said, "What shall I head this?" the editor replied, "Drunkenness is Folly." The compositor, having a foul case, set up "Drunkenness is Jolly." Both editor and printer were right.

Time for Matrimony.

Dr. Johnson in his work on the economy of health, says that marriage should not be contracted before the first year of the fourth septennial on the part of the lady, nor before the last year of the same on the part of the gentleman; in other words, the female should be at least twenty-one years of age, and the male twenty-eight years. The doctor says there should be a difference of several years between the sexes, at whatever period of life the connection if formed. There is a difference of seven years, not in the actual duration of life between the two sexes, but in the stamina of the constitution, and in the symmetry of the form and lineaments of the face. In respect to early marriages, so far as concerns the softer sex, for every year that marriage is entered upon before the age of twenty-one, there will be on an average, three years of premature decay, more or less apparent, of the corporeal fabric.

A Simple Calculation.—"Ike," said Mrs. Partington, "how do they find out the distance between the earth and the sun?" "Oh," said the young hopeful, "they calculate a quarter of the distance, and then multiply by four."

Criticism of Miss Braddon has not yet been exhausted. One writer says: "It is a pity Lady Audley hadn't kept her secret."

Chicago and California Mail.

Chicago enterprise and influence have achieved another triumph, and one that will carry with it the best wishes of the entire country, especially those of our friends on the Pacific slope. Heretofore the California overland mail has been transmitted via St. Louis and the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, thence westerly across the Plains, at an annual cost of many thousands of dollars. Arrangements have been perfected whereby the California mails from the Eastern and Northern States are to be conveyed via Chicago, and thence west by the Chicago and Northwestern Railway to Boonsboro, Iowa, thence via the Western Stage Company to Omaha, and thence by Ben. Halliday's Overland Line, via Fort Kearney, to Salt Lake, Idaho, and San Francisco.

This route offers a saving of forty-eight hours in time over the St. Louis route, and what is quite as important, the mails will be transmitted free of cost to the Government. This has been brought about by Chicago capitalists, an enterprise which the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company has seconded with its immense influence and power.—Journal.

Locomotive Runaway.—Last Monday evening there occurred in this city a runaway of a somewhat novel and unusual description—nothing less than that of a locomotive. The engineer had gone to his supper, and the fireman attempted to play the part of both switchman and engineer, in taking the engine to the tank for water, but unluckily made a signal failure. He reversed his engine and jumped off to place the switch, when the locomotive started off on its own accord, and went tearing down the track at a fearful rate, until it ran off the track at an open switch about a quarter of a mile from the place where it started, running about 150 feet on the ground after it left the track, tearing out the forward trucks, and damaging the machine considerably, though not so much as it would be supposed, under the circumstances. Had the switch been closed and the engine kept the main track, there must have been a general demolition, for the destruction of cars standing thereon would have been inevitable.—Clinton Herald.

A Check on Conductors.—The President of one of the St. Louis horse railroads proposes to introduce upon his line the Prussian gift system; each passenger who rides over the road is to secure a numbered check ticket for each trip made which, if preserved until the end of the year, will entitle the holder to a chance in a distribution of $2,000 or $3,000 in gifts to the passengers. Each day a quantity of these numbered checks are given to the conductors, who at night will be required to either return the checks or their equivalent in tickets or money; and as each passenger will be interested in securing his share of the distribution at the end of the year, and will therefore demand his check when he pays his fare, the company will have a check upon any dishonesty upon the part of the conductors.

Mail Service in Winter.—Postmaster General Denison has addressed a circular to railroad managers, mentioning the fact that service on the railroads generally during last winter, was so irregularly performed as seriously to delay the transmission of mails. "The remedy," he says, "is with the companies. Lessen the number of cars on the mail trains, especially on those carrying through mails, to the maximum that will not necessarily prevent their schedule time being regularly made, and the difficulty will be removed. The request for you to do so is in no sense unreasonable, but demanded alike for the interest of the government and the public, while your faithful compliance will only be the proper observance of your contract with the department."

Missouri Pacific Railroad—The earnings of this road since its completion to Kansas City, have considerably more than doubled, and George R. Taylor, its President, predicts that by 1870 the earnings will not amount to less than million dollars per month. Every effort to put its equipment on a par with the best eastern lines is now being made, and no line of its length east or west has a more brilliant future before it. Really, though not nominally, a part—and the most profitable part—of the Union Pacific Line, it does the carrying trade of Kansas and Colorado, and every section that is finished will throw more than a proportionate increase into its hands.

Suit for Lost Baggage.—Hattie Burdick sues the omnibus line in Chicago, known as F. Parmelee & Co., (the firm is composed of Frank Parmelee, David A. Gage and Liberty Bigelow,) to recover damages laid at $1,200. The plaintiff charges that about a year ago, she arrived in this city via the Michigan Central Railroad, and purchased an omnibus ticket for herself and baggage from that depot to the Rock Island depot. Her baggage was lost, and she now sues for the value, which she places at $1,800.

—The Jacksonville and St. Louis railroad will be completed by the 10th of January next, and thrown open to the public. This road will have a large passenger travel, and all freights from below intended for Quincy, Keokuk and other points on the upper Mississippi and in Iowa will pass by this line.

—The first ten miles of the Southern Minnesota Railroad, from La Crescent, was completed on the 23d, and there will be twenty miles completed by Jan. 25.

—The New Orleans papers say that the Adams Express Company has loaned the sum of $2,000,000 to Southern railroads to enable them to resume operations.

Putting it Strong.—The New York correspondents of the St. Louis papers, in giving an account of the Strong Divorce case, says of Mrs. S. "She loves not wisely but two Strong."

Economy.—The New Bedford Standard relates that a lady, the daughter of a person of great wealth, and having herself "great expectations," went to a washerwoman and asked how much she would charge a dozen for washing skirts. "One dollar a dozen," was the reply. "That is a good deal, but I want you to wash the lower half of the three skirts for me."

Three Cents Worth of Cholera.—A little girl being sent to a store to purchase some dye stuff, and forgetting the name of the article, said to the clerk:

"John, what do folks dye with?"

"Die with? Why, cholera sometimes," replied John.

"Well, I believe that's the name. I want to have three cents' worth."

His Idea of Comfort.—The Governor of an English country prison, when asked how many he could hang on his new drop, replied, "Why sir, we can hang six; but can hang four comfortably."

Business is Business.—A bereaved western widow addressed the pallbearers at the funeral with: "You pall-bearers, just go to the buttery and get some rum, and we'll start this man right along."

THE POET'S GRAVE.

In this pleasant beechen shade,
Where the crocus blossoms red,
Lieth one who, being dead,
Is neither matron, man, nor maid.

But once he wore the form of God,
And walked the earth with meaner things;
Death snapped him. See! above him springs
The very grass whereon he trod!

Let the world swing to and fro,
The slant rain fall, the wind blow strong;
Time cannot do him any wrong
While he is wrapped and cradled so!

Ah, much he suffered in his day;
He knelt with Virtue, kissed with Sin—
Wild Passion's child, and Sorrow's twin,
A meteor that had lost its way!

He walked with goblins, ghouls, and things
Unsightly,—terrors and despairs;
And ever in the starry aire
A dismal raven flapped its wings!

He died. Six people bore his pall;
And three were sorry, three were not:
They buried him, and then forgot
His very grave—the lot of all!

But strains of music here and there,
Weird children whom nobody owns,
Are blown across the fragrant zones
Forever in the midnight air!

THREE OF A TRADE;

OR

Little Red Kriss Kringle.

BY FITZ JAMES O'BRIEN.

The city was muffled in snow and looked as calm and pale and stately as a queen in her ermine robes. It was night, and the tinkling of innumerable sleigh bells, made the frosty air musical. The sleighs themselves sped silently through the streets, painted blackly against the white snow, as they passed like so many phantoms, winging their way to a festival on the Brocken mountain.

It was late for the corner groceries were shut. The last draught of poison had been drained over the counter. The last victim had staggered home to his trembling wife. The red, unwholesome light that flared over the door, had been extinguished, and the barkeeper was snoring in his bed behind the flour barrels.

In the bleak shelter afforded by the projecting wooden awning of one of the corner groceries in Greenwich street, close to where that thoroughfare nears the river, and huddled up against the side of the large coal bin that stood hasped and padlocked near the entrance, two little figures were visible in the dim glimmer of the night.

Two little children they were, sitting with their cold arms embracing each other, their chill cheeks pressed together, and their large weary eyes looking out hungrily into the blank street.

Down by the wharves they saw the tall, slender, masts of ships piercing the sky like the serried lances of some band of gigantic Cossacks. Among the black hulks, a few late lights still shone, and the air rung occasionally with the voice of some drunken sailor, who from a friendly doorstep, where he had involuntarily cast anchor, chanted his experiences of a young West Indian lady of color, who rejoiced in the horticultural name of Nancy Banana.

Presently a mystic music seemed to fall from the arched skies upon the city. It was the chimes from old Trinity ringing the Old Year out and the New Year in.

The thrilling notes of the changes following each other in measured flow, vibrated through the air like music made by the feet of marching angels. They jubilantly seemed to scale the slope of heaven. The wild, melodious clangor floated over the great, silent city. Myriads of aerial Moors, clashing their cymbals, seemed to march over the housetops. The clock was trembling on the stroke of twelve, and time had one foot already in the territories of the New Year.

"Tip, listen to the bells," said one of the two children who were huddled beneath the grocery awning, speaking in a faint voice, though clear, like a bell heard in a fog, "listen! It is time for Kriss Kringle to come."

Tip's cold lips opened and nothing issued therefrom but a low, plaintive "I'm hungry Binnie."

"So am I," said Binnie with a sort of far off cheeriness, as if his heart were at a considerable distance, and could communicate only faintly. "But let us wait. Perhaps Kriss Kringle will bring us something nice. What would you like most, Tip?"

"Coffee and cakes wouldn't be bad" said Tip hesitatingly, as if rather afraid of the consequences if he allowed his imagination to run away with him.

"Or a plate of roast beef rare, with potatoes and peach pie," suggested the more reckless Binnie, "just such as mother used to give us on Sunday. Poor mother!"

"What are we going to do to-morrow, Binnie to get some money?"

"Shovel show off the stoops," answered Binnie resolutely. "We'll go into Union Square early, and ask all around at the houses whether they want the sidewalk cleared. Some of 'em are sure to give us a quarter. We might make fifty cents, and then wouldn't we have a time!"

"When we were living in the country with mother, what fun we used to have on New Years," said poor little Tip, creeping up closer to Binnie with a shiver, for the night was getting very cold, and a few large snow-flakes had commenced falling straight down from the fleecy sky, white as the manna that fell in the desert, but alas, not so nutritious.

"O, golly! yes. What a good mother she was to us, and what things we used to find in the old stocking she used to give us to hang up. Kriss Kringle don't come to us any more, now that she's dead. I wonder if he really used to come down the chimney Tip, or if 'twas only make believe."

"I don't know," said Tip. "I watched ever so many nights, but somehow I always fell asleep just before he came, and then the things got into the stocking. I used to dream, though, that I saw him. A little man with a red coat all covered with gold lace, a long feather in his cap and a little sword by his side. And he used to smile at me and say: 'Tip will you be a good boy if I will put something into the stocking for you?' And then I used to promise, and when I promised I heard music sounding all through the house, a good deal finer than the music we heard when we went to church Binnie; and then Kriss Kringle would take off his hat to me, and make a jump and go clear up the chimney out of sight, like a red cricket. Ah! how cold it is, Binnie, and how hungry I am. Tell us a story.

The wind arose to the north and came down upon the city with a savage howl. The heavy snow-flakes fled before him into every angle and nook, like terrified white birds trying to hide themselves from some vast-winged, screaming falcon. They thrust themselves into the crevices of the windows and between the slats of the green window blinds; they got under the sills of the doors. They left the centre of the streets and flew madly into the gutters. They huddled themselves into the dark corner where Tip and Binnie were cowering, ran up the legs of their ragged trowsers, and slipped down between their frail shirt collars and their cold, little necks. It was a fierce, biting, scratching wind of prey, and poor Binnie and Tip felt his talons digging into their flesh.

Just as the pair of vagrants had drawn closer together, and Binnie was trying to stop his teeth—which began to chatter—from biting in two the thread of the story that the patient little fellow was about to tell his brother, they heard a faint cry, something between a moan and a whistle, sounding close to them.

Looking out into the dim twilight they beheld a dwarfish figure standing on the sidewalk, moaning and waving its arms. It seemed to be a little man about two feet high, clad in a red coat, covered with gold lace, and wearing a little cap, in which was stuck a long feather, that was bent nearly horizontal by the wind. A tiny sword, about the length of a lead pencil, dangled at his side.

"O, Binnie," whispered Tip, "it's Kriss Kringle come again. I know him. He used to look exactly like that in my dream. I ain't afraid of him. Are you?"

"Not a bit," answered Binnie. "He looks a nice little chap. I hope he has brought us something.

The little man on the sidewalk seemed very uneasy. He waved his long arm continually, took off his little cap, every now and then with a quick jerk, as if he were making a series of abbreviated bows to the two little vagrants and then hopped about, moaning the same shrill and extraordinary moan.

"Binnie, I think he's cold; let us ask him to come and lie down with us and warm himself," said Tip. "You know, in all the fairy books, if you treat a fairy well, he's sure to give you three wishes."

Whatever Binnie may have thought of the recklessness of the suggestion of warming anything by putting it close to two such little icicles as himself and his brother, the latter part of the speech seemed to strike him as containing a felicitous idea.

So, bracing his chattering teeth as well as he could, he said:

"Kriss Kringle, will you come and lie down with us, and we will warm you?"

The little red-coated man made no reply to this hospitable invitation, but danced, and shivered and moaned, and doffed his tiny cap many times in succession.

"Come, Kriss Kringle," continued Binnie, beckoning to the dwarf, "come in out of the snow."

"Maybe he don't speak English, Binnie," suggested the imaginative Tip.

This was a new view of the case, and Binnie began to consider within himself whether, by some inspiration of the moment, he might not suddenly master the particular foreign tongue with which their new friend was acquainted, when suddenly, the little man made a swift leap and landed right in Tip's lap.

"Why, Binnie," cried Tip, "its not Kriss Kringle after all; it's only a monkey!"

Sure enough it was a monkey; a poor shivering little Brazilian, with pleading eyes and soft, silky hands, and a countenance that seemed to tell of a life of sorrow. A bit of broken chain dangling from a belt round his waist told his story. The eternal organ in the street; the black-bearded, heartless Italian; the little switch that scored his back at home; the cruel pinches to induce politeness, when wondering schoolboys proffered their hoarded coppers; the melancholy pantomine of sprightly gratitude which was taught with blows, and performed in fear and trembling. Poor little runaway! Poor little vagrant! He seemed to know that he had found brothers in misfortune when he thrust his timid, silky paw in Binnie's hand, and laid his hairy little face against Tip's cold bosom.

The children vied with each other in attentions to the poor little wanderer. I do believe that if Tip had an apple or a chestnut at that moment, hungry as he was, he would have given it to his red little Kriss Kringle.

The boys placed him between them, and tried to snuggle him up in their tattered clothes. He clung to them as if he really loved them. His little hand found its way into Tip's shirt-bosom—if that collection of discolored tatters which he wore beneath his jacket could be called a shirt—and laid just over his heart. The poor vagrants kissed and fondled their pet; and God help them! were almost happy for the time.

Meanwhile the snow drifted and drifted right under the shed where the vagrants lay. It began to pile itself up about them on all sides, and it clung to every projection of their persons. The air grew colder and colder. The wind swooped at them under the shed—still, like the wide-winged shrieking falcon—as if it would take them up in its talons and bear them away to its bleak nest to feed its unfledged tempests. Closer and closer the three houseless creatures drew together, until a great drowsiness fell upon them, and the sough of the storm sounded farther and farther off, and sleep and snow covered them.

Then a dream came to Binnie and Tip. Red little Kriss Kringle jumped up suddenly from his rest in their bosom, clad in the brightest finery. A wondrous white egret's plume waved in his cap and he wore a breastplate of diamonds. His red coat was redder than the blossoms of the wild Lobelia, and his sword was hilted with gold. Then he said to the boys:

"Boys, ye have been very kind to me, and sheltered me when it was cold, so now ye shall idle in the sunshine forever and ever!"

Then he led them down to the wharf near by, where, moored among the black hulls of the ships, they found a beautiful golden boat, so bright with many-colored flags that it seemed as if her tall masts had swept the rainbows from the sky. Fairy music sounded as the sails were set, and they sailed and sailed until they landed on the sweet Southern shore.

There they found strange trees with leaves of satin and fruits of gold. Wonderful birds shot like stars from bough to bough. The rivers sang like musical instruments. From the limbs of the trees trailed brilliant tapestries of orchideous flowers, which, with their roots in the air, sucked the sunlight into their secret veins, until their blossoms were covered with the splendor of Day.

Here, red little Kriss Kringle led them to the foot of a huge tree covered with white flowers, and made them lie down while he fed them with fruits of a magical flavor. The sun shone cheerfully on their heads. The birds sung their pleasant songs. The huge tree rained its white blossoms on them, as they dropped off to sleep weary with delight, until they reposed beneath a coverlet of scented snow.

When the first day of the New Year dawned and the grocer's boy came from his bed behind the flour barrels to take down the shutters, he saw a mound of snow close by the side of the coal-bin. He brought the shovel to take it away, and the first stroke disclosed the three little vagrants lying stark and stiff, enfolded in each others' arms.

EVERY reader of our comic literature will remember Jonce Hooper and his inimitable "Georgia Scenes" and "Adventures of Simon Suggs." Hooper died a year or two ago. He has lately been followed to the grave by the original of one of his greatest characters, Simon Suggs. His name was Bird H. Young. He was a resident of Tallapoosa county, Ala., and seventy years of age at the time of his death. It is said that Simon Suggs was a faithful portrait of him. He was a wild, reckless spendthrift in youth, and a confirmed adventurer in manhood. He had a big generous heart, but few other virtues.

Unlike to mankind's mixed characters, a bundle of virtues and vices, inexplicably intertwisted, and not to be unraveled without hazard, roast pig is good throughout. No part of him is better or worse than another. He helpeth, as far as his little means extend, all around. He is the least envious of banquets. He is all neighbor's fare.

Do not make positively one good or bad, if there is danger that they make one better or worse.

A New Theory of Falling Stars.

(Translated for The Chicago Republican from the Revue des Deux Mondes.)

On the 14th of May, 1864, a brilliant meteor appeared in France, the most northern point of observation being Paris, and the southermost on a line immediately south of Agen and Montauban, near where its fragments fell. It moved from west to east, at an elevation of from 15 deg. to 20 deg. above the horizon, appearing like a fiery globe half the size of the moon, leaving behind a luminous train that gradually faded into a white trace, like an elongated cloud. To those residing near the point of explosion it appeared larger than the moon, with an oscillatory and rotatory motion, emitting vivid sparks and bursts of vapor similar to those escaping from heated green wood. When the explosion took place, a jet of fire threw fragments in all directions, a cloud was formed, and all disappeared. After a space of time, varying according to the positions of the observers, and extending from 84 seconds to 5 minutes & dull but very intense noise was heard, similar to a discharge of artillery or the rolling of thunder. Not a single detonation, like that resulting from the firing of a musket, but as if it had been produced in each point where the aerolite had successively arrived, and had reached the ear at different times on account of the unequal distances to be traversed.

Immediately after the explosion of the meteor and the cessation of the resulting noise, an abundant shower of —— stones ensued. They came obliquely from west to east, a result of their original rapidity and of gravity, and were warm; a farmer burnt himself while picking up one that fell on his premises, and it was noticed that the turf where they dropped was withered by their touch. Their surface had a black coating like that noticed on over-baked bricks, showing that they had undergone a surface melting, that could be afterward reproduced only by heating them in the flames of a blow-pipe; and as it was necessary to warm them to a white heat to obtain this condition, it must be admitted that they had that temperature before they fell.

An analysis of these stones showed that they differed in nothing from terrestrial substances. They were black, soft, and could almost be kneaded; they made marks like a lead pencil, and contained sulphuretted magnetic iron in small crystals, that shone in the middle of the mass; they contained 5 per cent. of carbon, which gave them their color. The presence of carbon in aerolites has been previously ascertained, but it is so rare that this is but the fourth instance. It is not pure, but is combined with hydrogen and oxygen, and, strange to say, is a compound almost identical with the scum formed in marshes by the decay of aquatic vegetation. There have also been found in this new meteorite great quantities of soluble salts that serve to cement a mass, which, when plunged in water, drops in pieces and falls to the bottom of the vessel.

The investigations made in relation to this subject show that the meteor certainly came from spaces inaccessible to the senses, but that when it became luminous it was 164,000 feet above the earth. The meteor had, therefore, entered our atmosphere when it was first seen, and continued its course until within 52,480 or 65,600 feet of the earth, when it exploded.

Air is the vehicle of sound; in proportion as one rises, and as the air is rarefied, noises lose their intensity. Gay-Lussac and Biot found that at a height of 26,240 feet, a pistol shot sounded like the crack of a whip. No one has ascended 60,000 feet, but it is known that the pressure is there lessened by nine-tenths, and that all sounds must be exceedingly weakened. But since this explosion was heard 49.5 miles, it must have been produced on a mass, and with an intensity that gives a great idea of the grandeur of the phenomenon; and by deduction from the comparison made by observers of the size of the meteor with that of the moon, it is ascertained that it was from 984 to 1640 feet in diameter, or four or five times as large as the cathedral of Paris. It also appears that it moved at the rate of 65,600 feet per second—a speed comparable to that of the earth in its revolution around the sun. This fact alone authorizes the presumption that it came from planetary spaces, and was actually a star; but as the following remarks are the result of previous investigations, applicable to all asteroids of the same nature, it is advisable to abandon the particular example and elevate the subject by generalizing it.

In many places malleable masses are found, almost entirely composed of iron, of different nature from the neighboring rocks, but themselves identical. Wherever found, tradition tells that they fell from heaven. One, a fragment of which is now in the museum at Paris, was found by Pallas in Siberia. The largest appears to be one at the source of the Yellow river, which is fifty feet high. The Mongols, who call it the rock of the North, say that it fell after the appearance of a fiery meteor. The most numerous ones are in the Chilian desert of Atacama, where they form two distinct heaps, close together, lying on the ground, and half buried as at the moment when they fell, and so abundant that they were carried to the port of Cobija, and used to shoe mules. Beside iron, these masses contain nickel; they are malleable enough to be easily forged, and there is no doubt that the inhabitants of the old world used them with the same ease that they did gold, which explains their scarcity there and their abundance in the deserts of America. Dr. Wollaston recently confirmed this conjecture in analyzing the knives used by the Baffin's Bay Esquimaux, and, as they contained nickel, he concluded they were made from meteoric iron. It is probable that that is the common origin of these different masses; but only one fall is well authenticated—that occurred in 1754, at Hradschina, near Agram, in Crotia. The oldest aerolite fell in Crete, in the year 1478 B. C. The priests of Cybele preserved it in the temple as a personification of that goddess. The Chinese annals abound in statements of meteors. Ma-touan-li, in that country, and Chladni, in Europe, have catalogued these occurrences. Since 1802 numerous savants have devoted themselves to the investigation of the nature of meteors, and the following general results have been attained: When of considerable size the meteors have the characteristics of that of the 14th of May; the same splendor, the same train of sparks followed by a continuing cloud, often an explosion, and, finally, though not so frequently, a shower of stones. They are seen of all sizes; as they diminish, the distance passed over by them decreases, and an explosion becomes more untrequent. Thus, insensibly, we come down to mere shooting stars, whose nature, origin and laws should be carefully studied, and the conclusions drawn therefrom applied to the larger and exceptional bodies.

It will, perhaps, excite surprise, when it is known that these shooting stars tnat appear hopelessly irregular, in reality obey well proven laws of periodicity. These laws have been discovered by making observations for a great number of consecutive nights, and taking, at the end of each year, the mean number of stars in each successive hour. It is found that this number increases progressively from 6 o'clock in the evening to 3 o'clock in the morning, and then diminishes until daybreak, and probably continuously during the day until the following night.

It was not long before it was noticed that all nights are not identical, and that those of the 10th, 11th, and 12th of August are so rich in shooting stars that 110 have been observed in an hour. This has been observed since the commencement of the present century, and is corroborated by the Chinese annals. This maximum, however, is subject to a rise and fall. On the 10th of August, 1800, only 59 stars were counted in an hour; in 1848, 110, and in 1858, 38, since which year the number has progressively risen.

In observing these increased numbers continually occur at the same times, it must be admitted that the earth, carried along in space, meets at the same points masses of corpuscles, disseminated in the planetary space, and on this an ingenious hypothesis has been made. It is supposed that these asteroids are distributed upon an immense ring, of which the sun is the center, along which they follow one another, each one accomplishing individually, like a little planet, a regular revolution around the sun. The earth passes through this great mass on the 10th of August, and then all the corpuscles passing near us will be seen circulating in our atmosphere. A circumstance not yet perfectly determined, but generally believed by all the observers, increases the veri-similitude of this hypothesis; that is, that on the 10th of August the greater part of the shooting stars seem to come from the same point in the sky, either Cassiopea, Cepheus, or the ram. According to one investigator, this great ring of corpuscles has a diameter nearly equal to that of the terrestrial orbit, toward which it inclines at an angle of 96°. It is from 4,800,000 to 12,000,000 miles in thickness, and is composed of 3,000 millions of corpuscles, revolving around the sun in 281 days. Supposing that each of them was 3½ feet in circumference, and that they were united together in a single sphere, it would hardly have a tenth of the size of the earth.

The trajectories of meteors have been calculated, and it has been proved that these fiery globes describe hyperbolas. A meteor that burst over the North Sea in March, 1863, was calculated, and was found to have a hyperbolic trajectory, with initial and final heights of 108 and 14 miles, and a velocity of 63. It is certain in all these cases that have been studied that the appearances are caused by true asteroids coming from celestial spaces, which enter the atmosphere, where they describe hyperbolas, and are carried with a velocity comparable to the planets themselves.

By the aid of the electric telegraph the trajectories of shooting stars have been calculated, and it is proved that they are, except in size, veritable meteors, hurled into space at the rate of many thousands of miles a second, and inflaming in the atmosphere.

When one of these masses, traveling with its immense velocity, meets the atmosphere, it encounters a resistance that diminishes its speed—a resistance which, on account of the rapidity of movement of the meteor, is very considerable, and would almost completely destroy, after ten seconds, the movement of a ball having an initial velocity of sixty-two miles per second. Assuming that a meteor has lost only a hundredth part of its velocity through this cause, it must have created an amount of heat that can be accurately calculated, which is employed in warming either the meteor or its surrounding air. But this is sufficient to raise the temperature 75,000 deg., supposing that it is not diffused by radiation, and 5,000 deg. only if it assumed to have escaped as soon as produced. The real increase of temperature is therefore comprised between 5,000 deg. and 75,000 deg., and is far beyond what can be artificially produced. Under these conditions the meteor melts, and its surface is covered with that glassy varnish characteristic of aerolites. Not only does it melt, but at 5,000 deg. iron and carbon burn, casting out sparks, and all known substances are reduced to incandescent vapors.

If of small size, as is usually the case, the stone is entirely consumed; a shooting star is seen which becomes smoke, and all is over. When it is larger, it lasts longer and has a more extended course. It drives before it the beds of air it meets, which are heated by compression, and becomes incandescent. For a contrary reason a vacuum is left behind where the anterior air rushes, passing over the surface of the meteor, which is enveloped in an atmosphere of igneous vapor. The circumstance deserves consideration, for it removes much apprehension. We are not illuminated by the solid mass, but by the fiery atmosphere of the meteor; this it is that attains such great dimensions, while the hidden kernel is incomparably smaller. This atmosphere appears menacing, but it is lost as soon as the velocity of the meteor diminishes. Thus it is that history has had no catastrophe to chronicle, and why the fragments are almost always small.

As the meteor compresses the air, this resists, and by reaction presses on its anterior face. An investigation of hurricanes will give an approximate valuation of this force. At their highest point they attain a velocity of 131 feet per second, with a pressure of 41 pounds per square foot. The pressure would be the same if a meteorite a foot square were thrown with equal velocity into motionless air; but if, instead of a velocity of 131 feet, it has one of 131,000, the pressure increases in an enormous proportion; at a height of 59,040 feet it is equal to 700 atmospheres—a pressure which only iron can resist without being crushed. But these conditions being similar to those undergone by the meteor of the 14th of May, this must have sustained a comparable pressure, and consequently have suddenly flown into pieces, like a stone thrown against a wall. At the moment of this disruption the flaming atmosphere disappeared, and one could touch with his finger the 50 stones, weighing about 20 pounds, that had caused this great uproar. But small as they are, they are fraught with precious information; they bring us the substances that compose the stars, and show that to its ultimate bounds the material world is composed of substances similar to those found on earth. They contain the metals that Kirchhoff discovered in the sun, together with carbon, ammonia, and chlorium, which escaped the spectral analysis.

It is known that the temperature diminishes according to the distance from the ground, and that it must be very low in celestial spaces—how low can be ascertained from the aerolites. Some are almost entirely composed of iron—a good conductor; and the enormous heat that has melted the surface thus passing inward, they reach the earth resembling red-hot shot. But this does not hold good for aerolites composed of earthy substances, through whose mass heat is slowly transmitted; the surface alone is warmed during their very short passage through the atmosphere, and the cold that they retain internally returns to the surface after they fall. Thus, stones that fell recently in the Punjaub chilled the hands of the persons who attempted to pick them up. But a measurement of the temperature of the center of these meteorites is important, for it is the temperature of the interplanetary spaces, where they moved before reaching the earth; and he who is fortunate enough to make this discovery will have contributed to physical astronomy a most important result.

NATURAL GAS.—Ten miles distant from Buffalo, some parties boring for oil, have lately struck upon an immense fountain of gas suitable for illuminating purposes. The Buffalo Gas Company are in treaty for the purchase of this gas, which may be supplied to the extent of forty thousand feet per day. It is supposed that it can be delivered in the city at $1,50 per thousand feet. If the natural supply may be depended upon for any length of time, the discovery of gas instead of oil may be regarded as the more fortunate of the two.

MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE.—A magician once upon a time advertised on his bills that the evening's entertainment would conclude with the mysterious disappearance of a lady. Sure enough, after the performance he eloped with the wife of the man who owned the hall.

PERSONAL.

BISHOP CLARKSON, of Chicago, met with a serious accident while on his way from Council Bluffs to Boonsboro, en route for his new mission in Nevada. The stage upset, by which mishap Bishop Clarkson's collar bone was dislocated.

THE following compilation from our exchanges shows how some of the generals, who figured prominently during the war, are now engaged.

Burnside has gone into the railroad business at Reno and Pithole. Carl Schurz is a Washington correspondent. Sigel has become editor of a Baltimore German paper. Franklin is superintending the Colt's armory at Hartford. W. S. Smith, the famous cavalry leader, has gone into the retail grocery trade at Chicago. Patrick has returned to the plow; Ferrero is leading the art of dancing, and Percy Wyndham is again fencing master.

Among the late rebel generals, Buckner, of Ky., is now associate editor of a New Orleans paper; Gardiner of Port Hudson memory, is a local reporter; while the general who drove off Franklin and his 15,000 men at Sabine is a bar-keeper at Houston. Gen. G. F. Anderson opened a butcher stall at Atlanta, but has become an auctioneer at Augusta. Gen. B. M. Thomas, a West Point graduate, is clerk on a steamer plying between Mobile and Montgomery. A Galveston letter writer speaks of seeing a rebel officer in the street "with his full uniform on, stars and all, driving a dray with a mule, whose harness was made of rope." Forrest and Wheeler, the two most prominent cavalry leaders after the death of Stuart, are employed, the former running a saw mill in Tennessee, and the latter doing a commission business in Augusta.

A. T. Stewart, formerly a Lieutenant-General in the rebel army, is now a schoolmaster at Memphis, Tenn. Another rebel Lieutenant-General is now in the grocery business in the capital of Tennessee, while an ex-Major-General directs a combination of public carriers. A famous Colonel runs a foundry in front of the Gayoso, House and another will soon run a railroad. There are also a dozen rebel Generals practising law.

THE Cincinnati Enquirer says of General Joe Hooker, whose condition was lately reported as critical, that paralysis has made sad work with his fine physical frame and handsome face. One whole side of his body has lost its vitality, and hangs flabby and loose, like a wilted weed.

GERALD Massey, the poet, has just completed a work on "Shakspeare, his Sonnets, and his Private Friends."

DR. William A. Hammond, late Surgeon General of the United States, has gone to Europe in charge of a grandson of the late John Jacob Astor; and a gossiping correspondent says that he receives for his services $10,000 in gold for six months, all traveling and subsistence expenses liberally paid, and $3,000 for each month occupied beyond the six.

AT a recent meeting of the New England Society, Dr. Bellows, of the Sanitary Commission, stated that 90 per cent. of the soldiers in the late war were Americans.

JOHN G. SAXE has a new volume nearly ready for the press entitled "The Masquerade and Other Poems."

CHARLES Dickens is to deliver the first of a series of secular Sunday evening lectures in London.

THE tenacity of the ruling passion was strongly illustrated in the case of the French dramatist, Dumanoir, noted as a purist in language, who died recently at Pau. A short time before his disease a friend was reading to him a letter written in his youth, and in which he says: "Dear friend, come back to Paris, so that we might be together." On hearing that he had used a false tense, namely, "might" instead of "may," the dying man, gasping for breath, exclaimed conclusively: "'Might!' Did I really say 'might?'". His friend apologized for having made an error in reading, and assured him that the proper tense had been used. "Ah!" ejaculated the dying author with an air of infinite relief; and for a time his failing strength seemed to rally, so great was his satisfaction at finding that he had not been guilty of a grammatical transgression.

A DR. F., an official of the little Bavarian town of Kaufungen, is said to have abducted a child of the Prince of Schwarzburg, which he keeps imprisoned in a cave, with a view of extorting a ransom for its release.

THE Prussian Major Von Schack, who shot Col. Calow in a duel, has been sentenced to ten years' imprisonment.

PRINCE Esterhazy is selling at auction his famous collection of arms, and has also dismissed the expensive body-guard of grenadiers maintained by his family for centuries past at Eisenstadt.

IT has been stated in the newspapers that Mr. M. C. Bruce, formerly a member of the rebel Congress from Kentucky, and now a commission merchant at Augusta, Georgia, had given the sum of $100,000 to the fugitive traitor John C. Breckinridge. This is publicly denied by Mr. Bruce, and he adds that Breckinridge is living in high clover in Canada and in a magnificent financial condition.

THE Paris correspondent of a New York journal reports, as something extraordinary, that Mr. Bigelow has made the acquisition of a carriage and two horses. The late Mr. Dayton also had a carriage of his own, which was remarkable for the tasteful simplicity. There was not any heraldry of United States arms upon it, as there is on that of Mr. Bigelow. In other respects there is little difference between the two. In connection with this important subject, we are enabled to state that Mrs. Bigelow has her fly, which she drives herself, escorted generally by a colored servant and one of her children.

JUDGE Terry, of California, who killed Broderick in a duel, is living in Mexico, near Guadalajara, engaged in farming.

BIERSTADT, the artist has made $120,000 with his brush in three years. He is now building a princely mansion at Bovington, on the Hudson, and drives the most stylish team in the Central Park—a pair of spirited black-hawks, both of which figured in the war.

THE property left to his children by Tom Sayers, including the value of his personal effects amounted to about $18,000. About $2,500 were found sewed up inside his vest after he died.

THE Tennessee Legislature has voted General Thomas a gold medal, in commemoration of his "splendid military services," and especially in the battle before Nashville.

HON. Gerrit Smith has instituted proceedings for libel against the Chicago Tribune, in the United States Circuit Court in Chicago, placing the damages at $50,000. The libel is said to consist of a statement in that paper that he feigned insanity in order to evade any responsibility in the John Brown Harper's Ferry raid.

IT seems by late accounts from Paris that Colorado Jewett is at work boring the Emperor and diplomats about getting up a congress of Sovereigns.

AMONG the passengers by the Cuba was John C. Heenan.

[illegible] inventor of the polka, Anna Slezak, sixty years old, is still living in Bohemia.

EX-PRESIDENT Buchanan was received into the First Presbyterian Church in Lancaster, Pa., a few weeks ago. John Bell connected himself with the First Presbyterian Church in Nashville, Tenn., a short time since.

Whenever you take a drink, be sure you keep your nose above water.

Curing a Nibbler.

Some people have a very ugly way of laying violent hands on small articles that don't belong to them, which cost others money, and which they don't think of paying for. Now it is very well known that groceries pay about the smallest profit of any other merchandise; hence the habit of some folks of going into a store to purchase ten to twenty-five cents worth of groceries—to be sent home, too—and while they wait for the goods to be put up, they amuse themselves by a mouthful of sugar, gormandize an apple or two, or guzzle a bunch of raisins, figs, slice of cheese, plug of tobacco, biscuit, or whatever else lies around temptingly exposed to view. You may rest assured that people don't trade and traffic for the fun of the thing, and if you gouge the grocer he'll be justified in keeping square with you by sending light weight and scant measure. A facetious old mercantile friend of ours was thus bled by a customer who used to come in daily to order something or other in the grocery line, and who having an amazing sweet tooth in his head, thought nothing of nibbling chunks of sugar, bunches of raisins, &c. One morning, Nibble came into the store before breakfast, evidently disturbed in mind.

"Mr. A——, you sent my quarter's bill last night."

"Yes, sir, I did."

"Well, there's one item I don't understand —'nibbles 3 mos. daily, $3.' What the dickens do you mean by that?"

"You keep a dry goods store, do you not, Mr. B——?"

"Yes, sir, I do."

"Now, suppose I came in every day to buy two or three shillings worth of goods, and each time I should levy on a spool of cotton, a paper of needles, or a piece of tape, which I never of course thought of accounting for—"

"Oh, ah, yes, yes; I take the force of what you are about to say: those little things do count up. You've got me now."

The bill was paid. The dry goods man did not take the matter as an insult, and what is still more strange, has quit nibbling.

A NEAT COMPLIMENT.—"I don't like cards!" said a young lady who is remarkable for a hand at once small, white and plump. "I see why," said Quilp, gallantly taking her dexter digits in his own; "I see why—it is because you are certain to get the worst of the game." "Ah, indeed," responded the beauty; "Are you quite sure of that?" "Of course I am," said Quilp, "because whatever cards you chance to hold, your opponent can't help seeing your hand!"

A DEAF AND DUMB TELEGRAPH OPERATOR WRITING BY THE SENSE OF TOUCH.—When the magnetic telegraph was first introduced, there was an arrangement by which the letters and words communicated were reeled off by means of punctures in long narrow strips of white paper, after this fashion, namely, . . — — . —, etc. These were translated by the receiving operator, and thus rendered into readable English. In the course of time this attachment to the Morse instrument was dispensed with, and the operators, instead, read the message by sound, or the clicking of the instrument, with the proper intervals for a clear understanding of the language, so that there could be just as much certainty as there is in speaking, compared to written or printed communications. The operator's ear was rendered more and more acute, and he therefore could hear the faintest vibrations, or the whisperings of the instrument. But one would scarcely think that the arrangement would suit a deaf and dumb man. It does not, but the deaf and dumb man can suit himself to even these circumstances. The fact is demonstrated. There is a gentleman in the American Telegraph Company's office, in this city, who, though he cannot speak nor hear, is classed as a first class operator, dealing with sounds! He can send and receive despatches intelligently, and finds no difficulty. But how is this done? By the sense of feeling. He places his leg against that of the instrument table, and in other ways reads by the slight jarring, while watching the operation of the instrument itself.—Wash. Chronicle.

THE question of smoking in theatres has led to a species of compromise at "Grand Theatre" Amsterdam. As many of the visitors, particularly the ladies, object to the weed, the managers arranged a "non smoking night, and it was on the whole, so successful that the managers resolved to make another trial. If satisfied with the result, he is determined to have two nights in the week set apart to those who do not patronize cigar and tobacco or habanas. In some parts of Italy, tin boxes are placed just inside the theatre entrances for the reception of remnants of cigars which are smoked during the acts, when the visitors sally out to the adjacent cafes for a few minutes. The cigar ends thus preserved are afterwards cut up finely, mixed with other tobacco, and distributed among the aged and other poor in the asylums and refuges for the indigent. In Milan the duty of collecting the cigar remnants in the cafes, is undertaken by a number of the Sisters of Charity.

The liver becomes affected and generates bilious disorders, pains in the side &c. The bowels sympathize by costiveness, Diarrhœa and Dysentry. The principal action of these Pills is on the stomach and the liver, lungs, bowels and kidneys participate in their recuperative and regenerative operation.

Eruptions and Salt Rheum.

Are two of the most common and virulent disorders prevalent on this continent, to these the Ointment is especially antagonistic the matter is spoiled is first to eradicate the venom and then complete the cure.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Ulcers.

Cases of many years' standing, that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions on the Skin.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic diseases are eradicated and a clear and transparent surface regained by the vestorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances and is never to fail rashes and other disfigurements of the face

Being a purely vegetable preparation they are safe and reliable remedy for all classes of females in every condition of health and station of life.

Piles and Fistula

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the aid of this ointment; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healing qualities will be found to be thorough and invaluable.

These bitters are prepared in pure Bourbon Whiskey from a combination of over twenty different kinds of roots, herbs and barks, which are by far the most and will other prepared from the same flavors, as seen by the great chief Red Jacket, for the Indian, who used them successfully in his practice for many years, and by their use gained the appellation of "Medicine man" and cured of Dyspepsia, Liver and Constipation, Sick and Nervous Headache, Fever and Ague, and all diseases arising from a disordered stomach, system, &c. Persons subject to any of these should be one bottle of this medicine, and they will find it to be the most agreeable, and perfectly pure and free from all drugs, and yet strengthening, put up in such perfect form that it can be taken by the most sensitive, and yet so palatable that it will be taken by children when no other bitters will pass.

They strengthen and invigorate the system.

They are unequaled for general debility.

They are a sure cure for dyspepsia.

They give an appetite and healthy appetite.

They are a perfect stimulant.

They are a cure for constipation.

They are a cure for liver complaint.

OUR DOVES.

It is a historical fact that doves were employed as messengers. Noah used them from his solitary ark, and at a later period lovers sent their letters by the same convenience It must have been a pleasing sensation to the lover to hear the beak of the dove knocking at the window, bringing a letter full of that sweet and soothing assurance so dear to the doubting heart. We also have messages to send to every one, but cannot do it in that romantic way. We must send our messages

May a long life of happiness be the lot of the above couple, for in their joy they forgot not the printer.

If you want Woolens—go to Moore's.
If you want Cottons—go, by all means to the leading Dry Good Store of R. C. Moore.

MORE IN THE SAME FIX.—In a local exchange we notice the following:

WANTED.—A lady wishes a situation as a housekeeper in a first-class family.—Widower or bachelor preferred. Can give good reference. OBJECT, A HOME.

Guess there are plenty of them in the same fix.

☞ The Board of Supervisors held an adjourned session on Wednesday last. A resolution was passed providing for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of procuring a small library for the use of prisoners at the jail. On Thursday the report of this committee was appropriating $50 to purchase such library. The Board also passed resolutions extending the time for the collection of taxes in some of the townships in this county.

☞ The re-construction of the rebel states and the prospect of war with Mexico, are now the most exciting topics of the times, but the drug Store of Dr. Curtis is also another subject of great interest. A beautiful assortment of Yankee Notions, Pocket Knives, the finest assortment ever brought to this town; also, Pocket Books, Beads, Photographs, Photograph Albums, and everything else that anybody can ask for.

☞ The Agriculturalist, for January, is received. It has several illustrations appropriate for the holidays, which will not be any the less pleasing notwithstanding Christmas and New Years have passed. It now comes with 40 pages to a number, and well filled with carefully prepared and thoroughly condensed articles and items with a number of attracting illustrations. $1,50 cannot be put to better use, than subscribing for this leading Agricultural Journal. Its large circulation, (over 100,000 copies,) shows plainly that its merits are appreciated.—O. Judd & Co. publishers, 41 Park Row, New York.

To my Sister, gone.

"Over the river" so bright and so clear,
Thou did'st sail gently, my own sister dear!
Gladly, and joyfully left this lone shore,
"While the boatmen so pale," plied the light silver oar.

Just at the close of a sweet sabbath day,
When for thy souls good, our loved church did pray,
Peacefully, quietly, and without fear,
Crossed thou the river, so bright and so clear

While thy worn spirit so sorely was tried,
Thou did'st remember, thy Saviour had died,
And with "sweet confidence," made strong by prayer,
Thou did'st embark on the river so fair.

As thy pure spirit did near the bright shore,
Where thou'st found rest from thy pains, evermore,
"Loved ones" did greet thee, while angels did sing
"Sweet Hallelujahs, to Jesus, our King."

Of the bright "shining waters," so deep and so wide,
Yet we'll pray God, that we may reach that bright shore,
With "Jesus, our Saviour" to pilot us o'er

☞ BLESSED.—Blessed is he who does not make a cent, for he will have no income tax to pay.

Blessed is the bald-headed man, for his wife cannot pull his hair.

Blessed is the homely man, for the girls shall not molest him; yea, thrice blessed is he, for when he asketh a lady to dance she shall answer him saying, "I am engagen for the next set."

Blessed is he who polisheth his boots and not his morals, who maketh the outside of his head to shine, but neglecteth the inside thereof, for all the girls shall rise up with smiles at his coming and call him beautiful.

Blessed is he who hath no brains, but brass in abundance, for he be the ladies' favorite. Selah!

Blessed is the man who giveth many and costly presents to young ladies; great shall be his reward—in a horn.

Blessed is the man who is always flat broke, for no man saith unto him, "Lend me five dollars.

☞ Joseph Camp was examined before Justice Robbins of Adrian, on Wednesday of last week, on the charge of committing rape on the person of Almira Perkins, a girl nine years of age. From the evidence it appears that the crime was committed in the township of Medina December 25th, Camp, finding the girl in an unoccupied building, where she had gone to play, and enticing her up stairs. The evidence of Dr. Power was procured to show that he communicated to her a loathsome disease. It also appears that Camp is related to the girl girl by marriage. In default of $2,000 bonds he was committed to await trial at the next term of the Circuit.

☞ C. H. ADAM & Co. are receiving weekly fresh supplies of new and seasonable dry goods. Notwithstanding the late rise in prices, they sell at their old low rates. As they buy for cash strictly and solely, they have no 5 per cent interest to pay on three months bills, and can always buy at the very lowest figures, and sell accordingly. If you want the best styles and qualities of dry goods, at the lowest possible prices, you will find them at C. H. Adam & Co's. Charley and his salesmen will be happy to wait upon their old customers and as many new ones as choose to call.

☞ We have received the January No. of "Demorests Mirror of Fashion." We can say but little of a Journal so universally known, prized and welcomed as an addition to the parlor literature of the day. It combines literature, art and fashion. The monthly is full of music fashion plates, patters, stories, miscellaneous family reading and domestic receipts, etc. Now is the time to make up clubs for 1866. Terms $3,00 per year with premiums to each subscriber. Address W Jennings Demorrest 473 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ J. D. Robbins has just received a large stock of Rogers & Bro's A. No. 1 Siver Plated Plated Forks, Spoons, Castors &c. All goods warranted the best made. Give him a call if you want a good reliable article at low prices.

☞ Are you troubled with distress after eating, heartburn, depression of spirits, desire for solitude, sick and nervous headache, and other affections of this class, rendering you unfit for the society of your friends or the world? we say, take the Red Jacket Stomach Bitters.

☞ Have you job printing done at the Herald Office.

NO SIR!—It is true that the popular remedy known as Coe's Cough Balsam does not dry up a cough, but loosens it so that the patient can expectorate freely. Give it to the children freely, and take it yourself for bad colds.

It does not take a week to receive benefit from Coe's Dyspepsia Cure. It will immediately relieve pain in the stomach, souring or rising of food, and cure the worst cases of Dyspepsia.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK.

It is stated "on the best authority," that Gen. Grant is not in favor of the immediate readmission of the rebel States.

An American enterprise is on foot to destroy the Spanish fleet off Chili by means of torpedoes. The expedition sailed from New York several weeks ago, and news of its success or failure is expected soon.

Secretary Stanton having positively declined to become the eulogist of Mr. Lincoln, it is now thought George Bancroft, the historian, will be selected.

A locomotive on the Toledo, Wabash and Great Western Railroad exploded its boiler at Decatur, Ill., on the 6th, killing Edward Miles, the engineer, and James Bristow, the fireman.

The house of a widow, residing at Normal, near Bloomington, Ill., was destroyed by fire on the 4th, and her two children perished in the flames. The mother was temporarily absent at the time.

At a fire in Leavenworth, on the 5th, a man, woman, and three children were badly burned, and two other children were burned to death.

Failing in this instance, they have suqsequently vented their spite upon other trains, to the great annoyance of passengers.

Dr. John W. Hughes, the murderer of Miss Tamzen Parsons at Bedford, Ohio last August, was last week sentenced to suffer the penalty of death at Cleveland on the 9th of February. The prisoner when called upon if he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, read a well-worded speech from manuscript, acknowledging the sentence just, and the punishment deserved.

A collision on the New York Central railroad occurred Dec. 30 at Port Byron, injuring several persons, and killing a passenger and brakeman.

In New York on the 31st ult., Mrs. Rosonna Gabey and her son Francis were suffocated to death by gas from a stove. Two other persons in the room were resuscitated by physicians.

Joseph F. Barker, a wealthy oil merchant in New York, while laboring under a fit of mental aberration, caused by pecuniary losses, recently shot himself.

A few weeks since, Mr. Christian Zimmerman, of Carbon county, Pennsylvania, while engaged in skinning a mule which had died of glanders, cut himself in the thumb. A few days after the sore inflamed, which was followed by abscesses forming in different parts of the body. These were followed by severe vomiting and diarrhœa. A fever of a typhoid character, accompanied by bloody diarrhœa. The abscesses which had closed were now re-opened; his face became very much swollen, both eyes were closed, and he afterward became delirious, which continued until he breathed his last. The disease of the animal was undoubtedly inoculated into his system.

Two young gentlemen of St. Louis, possessed of more means than brains, and with a large circle of female acquaintances, have announced the following bet for New Years. Mr. R. Lewellan bets with Mr. J. L. Smith that on New Years day he will drive a span of six horses in his round of visits, and make three hundred calls between the hours of 9 in the morning and 4 in the afternoon. The stakes are said to be $500 a side.

An Indian who had been peddling beadwork for some time past in Chicago, was killed last week in a drunken row.

A machinist fell from a scenic bridge at a theatre in Paris, and dashed out his brains upon the stage. The spectators for some time thought it was in the play.

The pleasing spectacle of a woman cowhiding a man, and the man meekly submitting, was witnessed in the streets of Philadelphia, the other day.

A young lady named Rose arrived at Louisville from Texas on Thursday morning, on her way to Shelby county, where she was to be married. On her way to the Lexington depot, she was run over by a wagon and so badly injured that she died in a few hours.

A Mr. Charles Windech of Detroit, while dancing the schottische with a lady, at a ball last week, and having made the circuit of the hall, staggered and fell, and before he could be placed on a lounge, was dead. He was lately from Titusville, Pa. He died of heart disease.

A man named Artemus Ward, and his wife died at Worcester, Mass., from the effects of inhaling coal gas. This is not the Artemus Ward of newspaper notoriety.

A little son of W. H. Fowler, near Equality, Ill., was burned to death Dec. 18. His father was making a fence, and he watching the gap, having built a fire to keep himself warm, when his clothes took fire, and he was so badly burned that he died in a few hours.

An intelligent lad 12 years old, who was stolen by Indians so long ago that he cannot remember the time, recently escaped from them and reached Mound Station, Colorado Territory, after riding a pony to death, and three days walking with scarcely any food. He could speak but little English but is fast learning.

If a man is "a case" we suppose his wife is a casemate.

THE RAILROAD INTERESTS OF A CITY.—When a municipality rises to greatness from the development of natural advantages, its aggregated interests can best be promoted by rival lines independent of each other leading into the interior country. Because, a railroad that occupies good ground, can command business ample to earn interest and dividends on the money invested in it; and hence competition for interior trade, distant from a terminus of a company's line, tends to diminish cost of transportation, and thereby opens up opportunities for enlargement and extension of commercial transactions.

The interests of a city are not identified solely with its small percentage of stockholders as such; but rather with its sales and its manufactures, the profits on its sales and the labor on its manufactures jointly making up the bulk of its gains, out of which the masses are subsisted and opulence acquired.

The seven hundred thousand inhabitants of Philadelphia need increase of carrying facilities by sea and land, corresponding with the enlarged scale of operations between the city and its markets. The carrying lines which sufficed for a city of half a million of indwellers, are inadequate for a city of three-quarters of a million of people, blest with the elements of aggregation, expansion and opulence.—R. R. and Mining Register.

ATLANTIC AND GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—The Atlantic and Great Western Railway Company are making vigorous preparations for the completion of their enterprise. The company has purchased a large tract of the swamp land lying between Jersey City and Hoboken, including the river front extending from the Hoboken depot of the Morris and Essex Railroad to the property of the Erie Railroad Company, which is to be appropriated to the purposes of depots, wharves and workshops. They have also bought, for $350,000, a large machine shop in that vicinity, of which possession was taken on the 1st of January. The company is making locomotives at the rate of six per month; and instructions have been given at the works to prepare three coal wagons, of ten tons capacity, per day. Sir Morton Peto has given assurances on behalf of the Atlantic and Great Western Railway Company, that in connection with the construction of the roads from Point of Rocks to Washington, and from Connellsville to Cumberland, capital will be promptly furnished, and vigorous measures taken to complete the road connecting Cleveland via Youngstown with Pittsburgh, and thus furnish to members of Congress and other parties visiting the capitol of the United States, a line from the northwest, eighty-four miles shorter than any other.

ELECTRICITY FROM WATERFALLS.—M. Gazal, a French savant of some eminence in the scientific world, has discovered a plan by which to utilize the force of waterfalls, not only upon the spot, but at a great distance from the fall. By this plan, the mechanical force of the fall is converted into electricity by the action of the water upon a combination of wheel work, somewhat similar to that of an ordinary water mill for grinding corn or sawing lumber, only that his mechanism will act upon a magnetic electrical apparatus. The economy of the process is as remarkable as its physical character.

By it sufficent magnetic force can be generated by an ordinary fall of water, to work all the telegraph lines of the continent. The Genesee Falls, which are a thing of beauty in high water, and always of practical value to the "Flour City," can under this invention, electrify the world.

ROMANCE.

[FROM JEAN INGELOW'S "SONGS OF SEVEN."]

You bells in the steeple, ring, ring out your changes,
How many soe'er they be,
And let the brown meadow lark's note as he ranges,
Come over, come over to me.

Yet bird's clearest carol by fall or by swelling,
No magical sense conveys,
And bells have forgotten their old art of telling
The fortune of better days.

"Turn again, turn again," once they rang cheerily,
While a boy listened alone;
Made his heart yearn again, musing so wearily,
All by himself on a stone.

Poor bells! I forgive you; your good days are over,
And mine, they are yet to be;
No listening, no longing shall aught discover,
You leave the story to me.

The fox-glove shoots out of the green matted heather,
Preparing her hoods of snow;
She was idle, and slept till the sunshiny weather;
O children, take long to grow.

I wish and I wish that the spring would go faster,
Nor long summer bide so late;
And I could grow on like the fox-glove and aster,
For some things are ill to wait.

I wait for the day when dear hearts shall discover,
While dear hands are laid on my head,
"The child is a woman, the book may close over,
For all the lessons are said."

I wait for my story—the birds cannot sing it,
Not one as he sits on the tree;
The bells cannot ring it, but long years, O bring it!
Such as I wish it to be.

The Spy System of Europe.

Few persons even among those who have made the complete tour of Europe, are aware of the extraordinary survilliance under which they passed. If told that a spy dogged them to every border, and that when they crossed that border, another spy took them in secret keeping, they would laugh, perhaps, at its improbability. But there are many things in European governments as undemonstrable as the governments themselves, yet which are existent facts nevertheless; and one of these is the spy system to which these governments in a measurable degree, owe their perpetuity. In France no man enters an inn, who is not reported at once to the Perfect of Police, his person being described, his business indicated and the length of his stay in the country made known. You see no official who makes this scrutiny, but it is made nevertheless—first by the innkeeper at whose house you tarry, in a blank form, filled out and dispatched to the police, and seconded by a shadow, who verifies the innkeeper's report, and keeps you in sight. In Paris to keep such a survilliance would seem impossible, yet it is done by the singularly thorough nature of the capital police. Every government officer is directly or indirectly a member of the police. As every place of resort, every amusement every palace, every pleasure-grounds is thick-set with "servants" so many spies has the Perfect in addition to his own regular force of gens d'arms, messengers' firemen, patrolmen secret detectives and "shadows." And, though you pass along, apparently unheeded through the multiform mazes of Parisian life, you are still under the constant observation of eyes as subtle as Lucifer's—under the hearing of ears as attentive as a surgeon's listening to the beating of a pulse.

Not alone on foreigners is this observation kept. The habits of every Frenchman are known—his companions and places of resort are known—his ideas are known; and as a consequence, every Frenchman is secretive to an intense degree—is suspicious—is shrewd, and way down in his heart, a hate reposes, whose only outlet is a dagger to cure the wrongs his humanity has suffered under the name of government. This is why the society of France is so dangerously inflammable—so revolutionary, for never since the days of De Medeci, have Frenchmen been free from the secret spy system of the government. Even in the days of the revolution when "the people" rioted, and their representatives ruled, the government spy was abroad as ever, dogging the steps of every citizen who did not assimulate with the republic. So engrafted upon government has the system become, that the people have come to recognize it as inseperable from it, and yet they realize to-day more than ever that a government which cannot trust the people, is little else than a tyranny. To-day in France, the great masses of the people regard the police with all its ramificolious, as but little else than an Emperor's guard, necessary to an Emperor's preservation; and so feeling, they will submit only so long as it is policy to do so; This none better realized than Napoleon; and the entire structure of his government is directed first to the end of securing his own power, and second, in reconciling his people to it—not by concessions, but by appeals to their pride as a nation, and to their worldly self interests, whose profits in trade and manufacture, he labors intensely hard to increase. He is one of the most successful of modern rulers because he retains his power, and day by day becomes more necessary to the trade interests of France.

In Austria we have the French spy system in all its details, but without any of its popular features. Every spy is a spy and nothing else. Whatever character he may assume, he feels the hand that moves him; he obeys with a dogged determination that renders him a mere machine—a creature having no wish or will beyond his duty. The number of spies in actual employ in Francis Joseph's dominions is enormous—so numerous that it has been said "every other Austrian is a detective, and all the rest are informers." In Prussia it is the same. From Vienna to Berlin is just from one German city to another—habits, manners, customs, laws, courts, inns, all seem the same. And yet how excessively jealous are the two nations. The French do not despise the English more than the Prussians despise the Austrians; and if both are hated and feared alike by all the German states, it is because they are to be hated and feared. The process of absorption even now has commenced; in the division of territory growing out of the Schlesswig-Holstein imbroglio, the minor states read their own future. No wonder then that Central Europe is a heart of fire, full of the fiercest passions, ready to burst forth on the slighest pretext. And no wonder that the German governments all patronize the spy system to a limit incredible to one not fully conversant with their internal and external dangers.

To illustrate this secret adjunct of power and to show how it is made to contribute to the State's safety, we may repeat the story of a young English tourist. We were discussing the question as to what European monarch belonged the credit of having the best spy organization, when he related his experience in that line.

I had, he went on to say, rambled over Prussia with merely an idle traveler's curiosity, subject meanwhile to all kinds of petty annoyances, when at last I reached Berlin, where I resolved to remain and await a remittance from my banker in London, my funds having suddenly run short, by reason of my purchasing a large diamond which had been offered me at a very tempting price. I selected a hotel of the second class, and established myself very comfortably, having, as I believed, about funds enough to meet my expenses until more should arrive.

I had been in Berlin, perhaps a week, visiting various places of amusement and curiosity, when one morning, after having been engaged in poring over an English paper till a late hour, I relighted a half smoked cigar, and sallied forth for a brisk walk.

I had not gone a hundred paces before I found a sentry's musket at my breast, and heard the ominous words:

"Sir, I arrest you in the King's name!"

"What for?" I demanded. "What have I done?"

"Broken the laws," replied the fellow with infinite coolness, at the same time rudely tapping my cigar with his musket.

"Broken what law?"

"The law against smoking."

"Is a gentleman not allowed to smoke in Prussia?"

"Not in the street, sir,"

"Well, confound your laws," cried I rather sharply. "I have been constantly annoyed by some miserable, petty enactment like this, ever since I first set foot in this country."

This was not a very polite speech for a stranger to make in any country, least of all for a man under arrest in this land of despotism.

"Forward! march!" said the sentry, indicating with his musket which way I was to go.

"Take me to your superior then, and let me settle this matter at once," said I with an air, supposing the whole thing would result in a pretty round fine.

The sentry called the officer of the guard who met me with a civil bow.

"Fined for smoking in the street, I suppose," I said in a sort of explanatory way.

The sentry whispered a few words in his ear.

"You must pass the night in the guard-house," said the officer turning to me.

"Pshaw!" said I "you are only jesting; come, what is the fine?"

"How long have you been in Prussia?" asked the officer.

"About eight months," I answered.

"And you have yet to discover that officers of justice in this country are not in the habit of jesting with affairs of state?"

Oh, then smoking a cigar in the street is an affair of state in Prussia, is it?" said I in an ironical tone.

The officer frowned and bit his lip, but made no reply.

We reached the guard-house in silence.

"Surely not in there!" said I as my conductor threw open the door of a damp, filthy cell.

"Enter!" was the stern response.

I did so, and was left to pass the night alone, as best I could.

Early the next morning, I was marched off to the police office, and found myself among a crowd of miserable wretches who had been arrested during the night for various crimes, and were now huddled together here to await examination. As I was the only well dressed person of the party, and had been brought here for a slight irregularity, I naturally expected my turn would come first.

I was mistaken; perhaps it was the design of the authorities was to humble me still further. At all events, one after another of my companions in misery were led off and disposed of until I was left alone. I was vexed and at the same time a little alarmed. Perhaps the whole affair was going to turn out a good deal more serious than I had considered possible—it had already done so—and I might be far from through with it yet. I had committed no crime, it is true; in fact, I had done nothing to merit the disgrace and punishment I had already received. But I knew enough of the arbitrary power of despotism to make me feel not a little concerned, and to regret in some measure my hasty and passionate words.

At length I was summoned into a small, narrow room, divided by a bar, behind which sat a man with one eye, a large scar across his left cheek, and whese sardonic expression of countenance would certainly have kept me from selecting him for a boon companion. With his one eye, he took a quick, sharp survey of my face, and then in a squeaking voice, demanded my name.

"Richard Beresford."

He turned and fumbled over a pile of papers, and at length drew out one which I recognized as my passport.

"Hum! an Englishman!" he muttered with an expression which showed he had no liking for the nation.

He then referred to a large book which lay on his desk beside him, and after examining it a few minutes, said in the same squeaking voice:

"This matter is serious, and must be decided by higher authority."

"And all this grows out of simply smoking a cigar in the street does it?" said I in a tone which betrayed some of the irritation I felt.

"You will see sir!" was the short, surly rejoinder of the one-eyed functionary who held the office of Inspector of Police.

I could not resist the temptation to reply, notwithstanding I knew it would no me more harm than good.

"Well," said I; "If I am to be kept in durance much longer, I hope I shall be furnished with something to eat or allowed to procure it myself, for I have no desire to be starved to death for nothing."

To this the inspector did not even condescend a reply, but taking up a printed blank he filled it out and handed it to my conductor or guard, who immediately tapped me on the shoulder, and told me to follow him. We left the room by a door opposite to the one by which we entered. Hearing a step behind me, I looked back and discovered a soldier with a musket, following just one pace behind me. For the first time I really trembled. All this caution and care meant something; perhaps I was to be immured in a dungeon. I had not done anything—but what of that? I was in the power of men who might deal harshly with me, and what redress would I have—what means of escape from their clutches? I might also die in a dungeon. Politically speaking, the English government was bound to see me have my rights; but getting redress for a wrong by government interference is a slow process at best, and I was not in the least consoled by thinking of it at the time.

After being led through a long, narrow passage, I was conducted into another small dingy room, on the door of which was painted, "Department of Arrests." In this department were three men, two of them writing at desks behind the bar, and the third, a little, grim old man was busily poring over what seemed to be an official document. This third personage, who was in reality the great Mogul of the place, did not deign to lift his eyes from the manuscript in his hand, or even so much as glance at my inferior self, but kept on reading and occasionally making notes for more than an hour, at the end of which time he got up and went out, and was gone at least two hours more, I being all the time kept standing and waiting in the most anxious suspense. In Prussia, however, a prisoner can wait—who cares?

At last the little grim old man came shuffling back to his place, and having adjusted his spectacles, signified that he was ready for any new case, which in this instance, happened to be mine.

"The prisoner will step up close to the bar,' said the old man in a cracked and grating tone.

I obeyed the order, and found my face about two feet from his. He opened a large book, and after one sharp glance at me, fixed his eye on that.

"What is your name?" was his first question.

"Richard Beresford"

"Your country?"

"England."

"Your age?"

"Twenty-six."

"Your profession or occupation?"

"Gentleman."

"What you mean by gentleman?" and he peered at me sharply over his spectacles.

I was tempted to reply by asking him if they had no such personages in Prussia; but I refrained, knowing that my sharp answer would react upon myself.

"In England," I said in a very civil tone, "a gentleman is a person of good family and education, who has the means to live without any particular business."

"Ah, I see" he rejoined with a sneer. "Have you parents?"

"I have."

"Where does your father live?"

"A few miles from London."

"What is his business?"

"He lives on his income."

"Umph! Well sir, how long have you been in Prussia?"

"About eight months."

"Where have you been since entering the Kingdom?"

I named the places I had visited in regular order.

"You mention Dessau," he said, making reference to his books. "When were you there?"

"Last month."

"How long were you there?"

"I do not remember the number of days."

"I will tell you—five. You stopped at the White Horse, a not over respectable inn. You rose late and went to bed late, and spent your time in rambling about in an idle way—smoking cigars and sometimes swearing at things which did not suit you. You see we have it all here," he added, tapping his book. "Now then, you left Dessau and went to Wittenberg.

"I did."

"How long were you there?"

"A week or two."

"A vague, unsatisfactory answer. You were there just two weeks and one day. What did you do there?"

"About the same as at Dessau."

"What did you there different from any other place where you stopped in the Kingdom?"

"I do not remember."

"No? Then your memory is not worth much. I will tell you. You purchased a diamond of a small, dark man, for less than its real value."

I started with surprise. Was every movement, every act, I might almost say every thought of mine since entering the confines of Prussia, known to the police. It seemed so.

"Why did you purchase that diamond for less than its real value?"

"Because the owner offered to sell it at a tempting price," I answered, wondering what was to grow out of this.

"The owner you say? How did you know who the owner was?"

"I supposed of course that it belonged to the man that sold it."

"Rightfully?"

"Yes Sir."

"Then why did you suppose that he would sell it under its real value?"

"Because he said he was anxious to raise ready money."

"Did you not think that the diamond was stolen?"

I had no reason to think so from the price. It is natural for persons to offer jewels, or anything else, in fact, for less than their real value, when anxious to raise the ready money."

"Yes, and a thief will sell for less than the real owner."

"Undoubtedly."

"You only paid about three-fourths the worth of that diamond; this should have made you suspicious. In fact you were! You believed that diamond to have been stolen if you did not indeed know it. And you were right. It was stolen. It belongs to a set owned by Count Esterhazy. Where is it now?"

I produced it with a good deal of tremulous misgiving. It had cost me a thousand pounds—a good deal to much to lose. The old man took it and examined it with avaricious eyes.

"Of course, this having been stolen, is forfeited," he said. The only question is whether you as the receiver ought not to be held equally guilty with the thief, who has already been arrested, tried, convicted and condemned. All things considered, however I have decided to let you go. You are fined five dollars for smoking in the street. Pay that sir, and beware how you again fall into the hands of the police."

"And am I to lose my diamond, and the thousand pounds I paid for it?" said I, scarcely able to keep down my anger.

"You may thank me, sir, that you get off thus easily under the circumstances!" said the old man, throwing up his spectacles.

"This matter shall not rest here, though!" said I, as I laid down my fine and turned to go.

"No threats to the officers of this government, if you please!" said the grim old man, with a look that made my flesh creep; "or you pass from here to a dungeon at once! You have already said enough since your arrest to put you where your friends could not find you; and if I hear another word of insolence, you shall go there! Take my advice, young man, keep your tongue close in Prussia, and leave the kingdom as soon as you can!"

I did; and if ever they catch me in that region again the thieves shall have the liberty to rob me of another thousand pounds! exclaimed the narrator, as he flung his cigar from his lips with an energy which proved that the memory of Berlin was not pleasant.

What a contrast to all this does our own Republic offer! Here each man moves as he wills; he talks as his judgment dictates; he acts as he sees fit. No spy dogs his steps; no passport is required to give him the privilege of travel; no boundaries are established to restrict his right to residence or passage anywhere in all the broad domain. Here, where the Government is the people, a spy would be an anomaly—tolerable only in a time of war, and then only so far as the public safety required;—when the danger ceased even the most vengeful enemy would be free from surveillance, save by officers of the civil law whose province it was to take cognizance of actual offenses against the Statutes. The Republic is one, and a citizen of Maine has rights in Texas which guarantee him "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Blessed Fate that cast our destiny here rather than in Europe; and O, most Providential Fate, which, through the perils of civil war, has brought forth a Nation, one and indivisible.

How to wash Woolen Clothing.—In washing all woolen garments, put them in boiling hot soapsuds water so as to be covered; then move the garments about in the water, after a few minutes pass them through your clothes wringer. Do the rinsing in boiling water and wring as before; this process will to a considerable extent, prevent falling or shrinkage. Boiling hot water will lessen the washing of all kinds of garments. Our experience is, that the hotter the water the easier the washing. With a Union Washing Machine and a clothes wringer combined, all garments can be washed, rinsed and wrung, perfectly, without putting the hands in the water; thus enabling the operator to use boiling hot water. Messrs. VanName & Co., Chicago, Cincinnati, or St. Louis, are the western agents for the above mentioned machine and will send circular on application.

The writer has used the machine for two years past, and thinks it perfect. In washing flannels it is invaluable.

This information is worthy of being communicated to every person who expects to be a good housekeeper,

.....A Down East editor, in a complimentary notice of a vigilant general, was made by the omission of a single letter to call him a battle-scared veteran. The poor man hastened to make amends in his next issue by stating that it was his intention to have denominated the hero a bottle-scarred veteran.

Notes from a Short-hand Reporter.

A graceful and accurate system by which words are committed to paper as fast as they can be uttered, has in it, to the popular mind, something of magic and mystery. The reporter at public meetings occasionally finds a man staring at his notes over his shoulder with undisguised admiration and astonishment, sometimes inquiring, incredulously, "Can you take it down just as they speak it?" or "Can you read that?" Yet shorthand is explained by the very simple idea that a man ought to be able to move his fingers as rapidly as he does his tongue. As the tongue forms a sound, why may not the finger also trace it? What reason is there why writing should not be as rapid as speech? The invention of letters may have marked an era of progress at a dark period of the world's history, but it is questionable whether we of this generation have any reason to thank our ancestors for saddling upon us the awkward and complicated method of writing which has dragged its slow length along through the centuries and consumed an infinite amount of time of the human race in a useless and tedious mechanical operation. But, even with this cumbrous alphabet, there is no sensible argument for spelling the word though with six letters. Phonography, or writing by sound, —which is the system of shorthand now in general use—dispenses with these encumbrances of letters, and is based on a phonetic alphabet. Having defined the sounds of the language, it takes the simplest marks that can be made—short, straight lines and curves—to represent the consonants, and assigns dots, and dashes of the size of a hyphen, to represent the vowels. The consonants form the outline of the word, and the dots and dashes, according to their position, indicate the vowel sounds. But as the tongue blends particular sounds rapidly, so it became necessary to introduce contractions of the phonographic alphabet, and this was done by means of circles and hooks, large and small, and by double-length characters. The system, therefore, is simply one of straight and curved lines, circles, hooks, and dots. The letter s occurring so frequently at the end as well as at the beginning of words, it was provided that that letter should be represented by a small circle. The letter t is a short, straight, perpendicular mark; st, therefore, would be a character something like a half note in music stricken downwards; ts would have the circle at the end. K is a short, straight, horizontal line; to represent ks the line would have a circle at the end. A great many words begin with a consonant followed by r or l, as pray, play, crows, clothes. It was, therefore, contrived that a little hook commencing the consonant mark should represent these letters. A hook on the upper side, or right hand side, represented l; on the under, or left hand side, represented r; so clothes, pronounced klos, would be a straight, horizontal stroke, commencing with a slight hook on the upper side, and ending with a small circle, also on the upper side, all made with a continuous motion of the pen, and the dash for the vowel added afterwards. In writing skl a a little circle was added inside the hook; in writing shr the s circle was simply placed on the r side of the character. So n and tion occur frequently at the end of words, and these were provided for in a similar manner. Thus, with other contractions and modifications to be learned in the proper books, a complete system was constructed by which the fingers easily keep pace with the vocal organs.

But shorthand is not yet sufficiently perfect to take the place of longhand, though improvements are being introduced every year which render it more simple, consistent, and conspicuous, and remove complications and arbitrary expedients. In shorthand as it is practiced, for instance, it is necessary to make a distinction between a light and heavy stroke, which, with a pencil, is very difficult to do. A perpendicular stroke, as we have said, is t; but the same stroke made heavier is d, that letter being essentially only a heavier sound of t. A horizontal stroke is k; the same stroke made heavier is g hard. A light downward curve is f, a heavy one is v, and so on. Phonography is used almost solely now for verbatim reporting. Many contractions which impair its beauty and correctness, but which make it more rapid, are the result of its use merely for this purpose. In verbatim reporting the vowels are mostly omitted, the consonant outline being sufficient to indicate the word. Many of our commonest words are represented by contractions of their outline used as word-signs. These word-signs, in their turn, are blended into one continuous motion of the hand, so that hundreds of phrases, such as "I do not know," "Under the present circumstances," "Mr. Chairman," etc,, are represented by a distinct character. Some reporters join words together more frequently than others. A slight mistake in translating the notes of a speech or dictation, or testimony in courts, sometimes results in very ludicrous blunders. The instance in which a reporter is stated to have rendered the Latin quotation, "Amicus Plato, amicus Socrates, sed major veritas," as follows: "I may cuss Plato, I may cuss Socrates, said Major Veritas," is probably an invention, but does very well for an illustration. At a meeting in New York, Elihu Burritt once closed a speech with a sentiment to the effect that "Labor, thought-honored labor, may be the only earthly potentate that shall be crowned on this continent." What must have been his surprise to have found it printed in a morning paper, "Labor, that honored labor, may be the nail lately patented that shall be crowned on this continent." The consonant outline of "only earthly potentate" being similar in his notes, to "nail lately patented," the reporter was stupid enough to write it out according to his first impression. Another reporter, writing the sentence, "Shall awaken all along his path of glory," rendered it, "Shall wagon all along his path of glory," the outline for wagon being nearly the same as that for awaken." A reporter, writing out one of Dr. Chapin's sermons—which are sometimes full of large words, and, when he rises into the ecstacies of eloquence, are delivered with more rapidity than is the case with any other orator in America—once came across the sentence, "Christianity has been the oriflamme of freedom in all ages." His notes were rather indistinct, and he was not familiar with the word oriflamme. After much cudgeling of his brains, he finally rendered the sentence, "Christianity has been the hornblower of freedom in all ages." That was the only word at all appropriate which he could guess from the peculiar phonographic outline of oriflamme. A practiced and intelligent phonographer, however, very seldom makes a mistake through any imperfection of his art. Two good reporters have been known to take a speech for different papers, in which, when published, there was scarcely the variation of a word In a noisy assemblage, or in reporting an indistinct speaker, it is oftener the case that words are misunderstood. Of this character was a report in which the sentence of a lecturer, "Put a coal on the back of a turtle and it will travel," was given, "Put a pole on the back of eternity and it will travel." The printers, too, are responsible for a large proportion of mistakes generally attributed to the reporters. There are thousands who have studied shorthand so as to understand its principles, but who had not the patience to practice themselves in it sufficiently to write it rapidly enough to be of any use to them. There are not more than twenty-five really proficient reporters in New York; Washington supports a dozen or more, and such cities as Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, have only four or five each. They earn, when working, from thirty to eighty dollars a week. For reporting military commissions the government pays seventy dollars a week.

Though phonography is not yet sufficiently perfect to supersede our present system of writing, it has, at least, demonstrated the possibility of such a result. It has the balance of argument in its favor. Longhand is not by any means an exact system. Half the handwriting of the day is almost illegible to all but the person who writes it. The simplest combination of marks must necessarily be the most legible. The word though in longhand requires more than twenty distinct motions of the pen; in shorthand it requires only two, and, of course, the latter is the most legible. The eye catches the meaning of the figures "1865" quicker than of the words "eighteen hundred and sixty-five." A perfected shorthand which shall answer all the purposes of ordinary writing, if taught in the schools, would make its way into general use by its own usefulness and economy, until those who only understood the old system would wake up some morning to find themselves obsolete. If shorthand were adopted, of course fine penmen would lose the opportunity for graceful flourishes in their chirography, for every mark must then mean something. Those writers who attempt to make their articles humorous by shocking orthography would be compelled to depend upon their ideas alone for their wit. The adoption of phonography would also tend strongly to hasten the use of a phonetic alphabet in printing, and, perhaps, in the distant future, a shorthand type might also be invented. The writer for the press would give his manuscript in shorthand to the printer, thus saving him three-fourths of his labor. This might seem to some an argument against it, rather than in its favor. The world, we are told, is inundated with printed matter now, and any innovation which will facilitate writers in furnishing copy for the press would be a positive curse to the community. The want of the time is not more literature, but less and better literature. As it is now, a man can hope to read only a few of the volumes put forth by the publishers. If Dumas had the advantage of shorthand, the startling result might occur that he would write novels so rapidly that a man of ordinary intelligence, reading all the working hours of the day, and reading this author's works alone, would not be able to keep up with him, besides running the risk of becoming a hopeless lunatic in the attempt. But everything that diminishes labor benefits the community, and the rule will not be falsified in the case of authors. A writer once said of his book, "I wrote it in two volumes because I had not time to write it in one." The author will have more time to think and to condense; he will not write more, but he will write better. Literature is priced in the market to-day, too generally, according to quantity rather than according to quality. When it becomes more easily obtained, all the more care will be given to its quality. It is when peaches are plenty that we ask for those that are ripe, large, and luscious. The minister, student, and author, now dragging this pen-burden after them, day by day, will then find time for reading, meditation, and, above all, for recreation. The amanuensis, the copyist, the book-keeper, the thousands upon thousands who, in a great city, sit at their desks all day in dark offices, bending their spines over the paper, as the seamstesses used to bend over their cloth, will find half of their lives restored to them. Somebody has written a parody on "Stitch! stitch! stitch!"

commencing

"Scratch! scratch! scratch!"

vividly portraying the miseries of the slaves of the pen. But shorthand will accomplish a greater revolution than the sewing machine, for it will shorten and straighten the road to learning, and give a new impulse and a freer and wider range to thought. And it will also lift many oppressive burdens of labor, add years to many human lives, and hasten "that new childhood of the world," when

"Life of itself shall dance and play,
Fresh blood through Time's shrunk veins be hurled,
And labor meet delight half way."

UNCLE NED.

SONG AND PARAPHRASE.

In case any of our readers may not be familiar with the negro song of Uncle Ned, we give it below, with a paraphrase, which we take from a late exchange newspaper:—

I once knew a darkey and his name was Uncle Ned,
Oh, he died long ago, long ago;
He had no hair on the top of his head,
The place where the wool ought to grow,

Chorus—Lay down the shovel and the hoe,
Hang up the fiddle and the bow,
For there's no more work for poor old Ned,
He's gone where the good darkies go.

His fingers were long, like the cane in the brake,
And he had no eyes for to see;
He had no teeth for to eat de hoe cake,
So he had to let de hoe cake be.
Lay down, etc.

One cold frost morning, Old Ned died,
Oh the tears down massa's face ran like rain.
And he knew when Ned was laid in the ground,
He'd nebber see his like again.
Lay down, etc.

PARAPHRASE.

There formerly might have been seen an aged colored individual, whose cognomen was Uncle Edward.
And he departed this life some time since, some time since.
And he had no capillary substance on the summit of his cranium,
On the place designed by nature for the capillary to vegetate.

CHORUS.

Then lay down the agricultural implements;
Allow the violin and the bow to be pendent on the wall;
For there is no physical energy to be displayed by the indigent, aged Edward.
For he has departed to the abode, designated by a kind Providence for all pious, humane and benevolent colored individuals.
Uncle Edward had digits equal in longitude to the bamboo formation, which springs so spontaneously on the banks of the Southern Mississippi.
And he had no occulancy with which to observe the beauties of nature;
And he had no dental formations with which to masticate the Indian meal cake;
Consequently he was forced to permit the Indian meal cake to pass by with impunity.
When Uncle Edward relinquished his hold on vitality, his master was exceedingly grieved,
And the lachrymal poured down his cheeks similar to the rains from heaven;
For he knew that the old man was laid beneath terra firma,
Consequently, he would never have the pleasure of beholding the physiognomy of aged Edward furthermore.

A Train Runs Away from the Conductor.—The Rochester Union has the following:

The first instance that ever came to our knowledge of a train running away from its conductor, occurred yesterday, on the Erie Road, at Avon. The morning train from this city stopped at Avon to dine. While the conductor, brakemen and some eight or ten passengers, were at the table, the engineer took his signal to start from the wrong person and went on his way toward Corning. As the train approached Livonia the signal was given to brake, but was not responded to, and the train ran by the station. The engineer backed up and went back to see what was the matter. He found the train was without conductor or brakemen. He received a telegram from the conductor that he was following with an engine, and waited accordingly. Misfortunes do not come singly. The engine which the conductor had procured at Avon to convey himself and passengers to Livonia, broke down soon after starting, and the party had to return and get a carriage, with which they drove to Livonia. The result of the mishap was that the train reached Corning nearly three hours after time.

One of the passengers who was left with the conductor eating his breakfast, had $17,000 in a satchel which he had left in the car, and a lady had valuables to the amount of over $2,000 in her satchel. These passengers were extremely anxious to overtake the runaway train and were relieved from anxiety when they secured their satchels all right. It was a mishap that might not occur again in many years.

The Distinguished Dead of '65.

The year just closed bears with itself from the arena of active life to the realm of memory many of the able men whose deeds have contributed to the history of the age, and whose opinions have moulded and guided the development of civilization. The termination of our terrible civil war has undoubtedly lessened the totals of the mortality lists, but this cause has produced no perceptible diminution in the losses of the great men, whom each succeeding twelve-month marshals into the mighty army of the dead. Many of the victims numbered in the holocaust of Death during 1865 were most illustrious in fame and character. The United States was called upon to mourn the loss of her President, three Senators, and four Governors from among her active statesmen. Turkey, Canada and Great Britain have followed the Premiers of their respective Governments to their tombs. The annals of literature have received their last subscriptions from the pens of Mrs. Sigourney, Dr. Wayland, Miss Gould and Mrs. Gaskell. Catholicism laments the death of the great Cardinal Wiseman. Music has lost William Vincent Wallace and William H. Fry, and art, McLenan, Herring and Neagle. The various departments of scientific lore have been deprived of ardent votaries in Encke, Dr. Worcester, Ollendorff, and Dr. Valentine Mott. Royalty has yielded to the King of Terrors the Belgian monarch and the heir apparent to the mighty empire of the Russias. Others of lesser fame are embraced in the melancholy list, including the wives of Lord Brougham, Mr. Seward and Louis Kossuth, the widows of De Tocqueville, Lord Raglan, Aaron Burr and Tom Moore, and the mother of the lamented Thackeray. The following is a classified list for the year, containing nearly one hundred names:

Two Rogues Instead of One.—An amusing incident is told of a woman in England whose husband, a wealthy man, died suddenly without leaving any will. The widow, desirous of securing the whole property, concealed her husbands death and persuaded a poor shoemaker to take his place while a will could be made. Accordingly he was closely muffled in bed as if very sick, and a lawyer was called to write the will. The shoemaker in a feeble voice bequeathed half of all the property to the widow. "What shall be done with the remainder?" asked the lawyer. "The remainder," replied he, "I give and bequeath to the poor little shoemaker across the street, who has always been a good neighbor and a deserving man," thus securing a rich bequest for himself. The widow was thunderstruck with the man's audacious cunning, but did not dare expose the fraud; and so two rogues shared the estate.

Worthy Sons of a Worthy Sire.—It is related, as pleasing instance of the transmission of noble qualities from father to son that the two younger sons of the late Horace Mann, upon the loss by their brother of his property in the Concord Bank through the recent robbery, at once informed him "that one-third of third of their joint bequest should be his."

Comical.

.....A wife, who often stormed at her husband, was sitting with him at the breakfast table, when suddenly, amid loud coughing, "Dear me!" she exclaimed, "a bit of pepper has got into my windpipe!"—Hurricane pipe, you mean, my dear," coolly rejoined her sarcastic spouse.

.....Why is iron sometimes like a band of robbers? Because it is united to steel.

.....A bird that always faces the storm—The weather-cock.

.....Cowper says that "the tear that is wiped with address, may be followed, perhaps, with a smile." If it is a woman's tear, the perhaps is unnecessary; you can generally dry it with a dress.

.....If you have a cough, don't go to church to disturb the rest of the congregation.

.....Is it not curious that the persons to inherit the property of the late Tom Sayers will be Tom's heirs?

....."Wouldn't you call this the calf of a leg?" asked Bob, pointing to one of his nether limbs. "No," replied Pat, "I should say it was the leg of a calf."

.....There is a good deal of the brute in man. For example, he is generally dogmatic, often puppy-ish, sometimes pusillanimous, and easily cowed; occasionally cat-egorical, and is always ready to be made a "lion" of.

.....Three boys went in bathing in one of the streams near Oil Creek, and when they came out they were so greasy that they couldn't stay in their clothes. As fast as they slipped them on, they would slip off again; and one of the lads, in a heedless moment, narrowly escaped slipping out of his skin. On reaching home, their parents being exceedingly frugal, wrung them out and extracted about fifteen gallons of pure oil from the three boys."

The Science of Health!

Every Man his own Physician.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS, AND HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

Disorders of the Stomach, Liver & Bowels.

The Stomach is the great centre which influences the health or the disease of the system—Abused or debilitated by excess, indigestion, offensive breath and physical prostration are the natural consequences. Allied to the brain it is the source of headaches, mental depression, nervous complaints and unrefreshing sleep. The liver becomes affected and generates bilious disorders, pains in the side &c. The Bowels sympathize by costiveness, diarrhœa and dysentry. The principal action of these Pills is on the stomach, and the liver, lungs, bowels and kidneys participate in their recuperative and regenerative operation

Erysipelas and Salt Rheum.

Are two of the most common and virulent disorders prevalent on this continent, to these the Ointment is especially antagonistic its "modus operandi" is first to eradicate the venom and then complete the cure.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Ulcers,

Cases of many years' standing, that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions on the Skin,

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic diseases, are eradicated and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Female Complaints.

Whether in the young or old, married or single, at the dawn of Womanhood, or the turn of life, these tonic medicines all play so decided an influence that a marked improvement is soon perceptible in the health of the patient. Being a purely vegetable preparation, they are safe and reliable remedy for all classes of females in every condition of health and station of life.

Piles and Fistula

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healing qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills should be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Mercurial Eruptions,	Swelled Glands
Sprains,	Burns,	Piles,
Sore Legs,	Stiff Joints,	Chapped Hands
Tetter,	Rheumatism,	Sore Breasts,
Chilblains,	Ringworm,	Sore Heads,
Ulcers,	Fistula,	Sore Throats,
Gout,	Salt Rheum,	Scalds,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,	Skin Diseases.
Wounds of all kinds,

CAUTION—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernable as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

 Sold at the manufactory of Professor HOLLOWAY 80 Maiden Lane New York and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine, throughout the civilized world.

These Bitters are prepared, in pure Bourbon Whiskey, from a combination of everlasting and different kinds of roots, barks and herbs, which act in perfect concert one with other, prepared from the original formula given by the great chief, Red Jacket, to Dr. A. OUR DOVES.

It is a historical fact that doves were employed as messengers. Noah used them from his solitary ark, and at a later period lovers sent their letters by the same convenience. It must have been a pleasing sensation to the lover to hear the beak of the dove knocking at the window, bonging a letter full of that sweet and soothing assurance so dear to the doubting heart. We also have messages to send to every one, but cannot do it in that romantic way. We must send our messages

That He, whose love exceedeth ours

Fold her, oh Father! in thine arms,
And let her henceforth be,
A messenger of love between
Our human hearts and Thee."

A Dark Transaction.

Now it came to pass on the sixteenth day of the first month, that Timothy received in his mind to tarry no longer in the goodly village of Tecumseh. Accordingly he drew about him his sable brother Calvin, surnamed Brown, the son of his father, who is an expounder of the Holy Scriptures, and Joseph also—not the meek Joseph who was sold once upon a time into Egypt,—but a namesake of his who maketh staves in the stave house near the eastern gates of the city, and Robert too, otherwise known as Bob, whose calling it is to shave the sons of Japeth,—and he gathered them all about him, even as a shepherd calleth together his sheep, and he spake unto them, saying: Verily, verily, I say unto you I shall tarry but a day longer in the land of my adoption, on the morrow I take my departure from the city and begin a lengthy journey. Let us then, even before the setting of the sun, partake of the fat of the land and the Barley juice thereof, that our ways may be known upon earth, and that we may remember each other in spirit, though our bodies are in foreign land. Yea, let us eat, drink and be merry. And when Timothy was done they all lifted up their voices and cried: "Bully Boy, You may count us in.—Whithersoever you ead we will follow.' And straightway they went and sojourned for a time with —— and —— and —— and they imbibed freely, and in the language of publicans and sinners, they became mellow. Verily they drank Timothy's health so much, that their own became effected therefrom. And they then adjourned to the home of Robert, even to his professional apartment, and there an altercation ensued even about a hat betwixt Calvin upon the one hand, and Joseph, whose sirname is Turner, upon the other. And thereupon, Calvin, in a reckless manner, struck out from the shoulder and Joseph being in to close proximity received. And Joseph, disregarding the injunctions of Holy writ turned not his other cheek, but struck out from the shoulder also, and by these means, Roberts house was made the scene of fratricidal strife. But Joseph was vexed in his soul and gnashed his teeth with wrath and he went straightway to an officer of justice and procured a writ that Calvin might be apprehended and receive the condemnation of the law. And thereupon Calvin was arraigned and Joseph submitted a complaint, yea, a lengthy complaint, and he raised his hand and was sworn, and the three footer of sable hue lifted up his voice and testified. And they all trembled and were sore afraid and their knees quaked with fear. And when the merits of the case were before him the magistrate spake unto them in this wise saying: "Calvin, the son of John, thou hast been guilty of gross misdemeanors and short comings, and shalt be amerced in the sum of forty shillings, lawful money of the land of the Welverines. So mote it be." And as the magistrate was about to pronounce his parting benediction upon Calvin, when there occurred a shocking contempt of court even by an associate officer of the law—whereupon the court rose in his majesty and commanding them all to tarry no longer but to depart straightway,—and they went. Here endeth the first chapter.

A LITTLE EGO.—On the first day of January 1866 the present publisher of the Herald became also the sole proprietor of the establishment. We own the paper now ourselves, and we shall spare no pains to make it what it should be, a first class country newspaper. Our stock has been overhauled, refitted and enlarged, our facilities for jobbing increased, and we are now prepared to execute job work of all kinds in the neatest style and upon the shortest notice. We have purchased several new and fancy fonts of type, and our job Department is now fully equal to that of any printing establishment of the same size in the State.

The general plan and arrangement of the paper will remain as heretofore.

Thanking our friends for their patronage in the past, we would respectfully solicit a continuance of the same feeling confident that we can give better satisfaction than ever before.

NEWSPAPERS.—Nothing is more common than to hear people talk of what they pay for advertising, etc, as so much given in charity. Newspapers, by enhancing the value of property in their neighborhood and giving the localities in which they are published a reputation abroad, benefit all such, particularly if they be merchants or real estate owners, thrice the amount yearly of the meagre sum they pay for their support. Besides, every public spirited citizen has a laudible pride in having a paper of which he is not ashamed, even though he should pick up in New York or Washington.

A good-looking thriving sheet helps to sell property, gives character to the locality, and in all respects is a desirable public convenience. If you want a good readable sheet it must be supported.—And it must not be supported in a spirit of charity either, but because you feel a necessity to support it. The local press is the "power that moves the people."

☞ C. H. ADAM & Co. are receiving weekly fresh supplies of new and seasonable dry goods. Notwithstanding the late rise in prices, they sell at their old low rates. As they buy for cash strictly and solely, they have no 5 per cent interest to pay on three months bills, and can always buy at the very lowest figures, and sell accordingly. If you want the best styles and qualities of dry goods, at the lowest possible prices, you will find them at C. H. Adam & Co's. Charley and his salesmen will be happy to wait upon their old customers and as many new ones as choose to call.

☞ Old Boreas has paid us another visit during the past few days, and has been rather more friendly than we could wish. If we were only on intimate terms with the clerk of the weather, we might perhaps have different arrangements. As it is, we are thankful for the little sleighing he has already vouchsafed to us, and shall be equally thankful for more.

CONGRESSIONAL.

The proceedings of the Senate on the 8th were unimportant.

In the House on that day Mr. Stevens presented a bill for an air-line railroad to New York. A resolution notifying the President that he must not withdraw troops from the South till Congress has ascertained and declared their presence there no longer necessary, was passed. The bill heretofore offered by Mr. Ward, denouncing polygamy, and declaring that, like its twin sister, slavery, it should be expelled from the territories of the Republic, if it should require the whole power of the Government to do so, was passed. In Committee of the Whole, Mr. Latham of West Virginia, spoke in favor of admitting Southern members to Congress. Mr. Shellabarger of Ohio, made a speech against re-admitting them till the South has thoroughly purged herself of secession, and accorded all the rights of man to every citizen of whatever race or color. Until that time he held that the States should remain dead in law as they are in fact, even if their representatives never came back to Congress.

In the House, on the 9th, there was a long discussion on a statement by a Representative in a letter to a newspaper, that the bill to facilitate commerce between the States relieved the Illinois Central Railroad from its obligation to the Government; and finally the Senate was requested to return the bill on the ground of its having been passed under a misapprehension. Mr. Voorhees, Copperhead, of Indiana, called up his resolution endorsing President Johnson, and made a speech thereon. He was replied to by Mr. Bingham of Ohio, who offered a substitute for his resolution; and both documents were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

From the Racine Journal, we hear of several narrow escapes of life at the late disastrous fire in that place:

Captain Charles Davis had a narrow escape from burning, and this incident will show how excited and bereft of reason men sometimes are in such times of excitement and peril. Capt. Davis had gone up on top of the Episcopal church to try if possible to put out the fire, but his efforts were of no avail, and he was compelled to relinquish his work, and seek safety in retreat. While the Captain was at work, some, seven or eight men carried away the ladder, and when he started to go down, he became for the first time aware of his perilous situation. The flames were approaching him from all directions, and spreading with frightful rapidity. But he retained his composure and presence of mind in this dreadful situation, and making his way through fire and smoke to the side of the steeple, he managed to get hold of the lightning rod, and lowered himself in safety to the ground.

Mr. Tapley, the post master, also had a narrow escape. He was on the roof of the Racine House, standing on the ridge throwing water. Very suddenly his feet slipped, and he fell and slipped off the roof, striking the roof below that from which he slipped, still striking another roof and from that he fell to the ground, sustaining very slight injury.

John M. Osgood, while working on the roof of the Universalist chuch, slipped and began sliding down, but his coat caught on a large nail, and stopped him until he was able to regain the ridge. A terrible boiler explosion took place at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon in the iron foundry of H. M. Brown, Chicago. The building was constructed of wood, and the greater portion of it was completely demolished. The total loss of property is about $10,000. Fortunately no lives were lost.

On the 2d inst., John Hendly was executed at Lawrence, Kansas, for the murder of John Sutton, in June last. He died perfectly resigned, but protested to the last that the act was done in self-defence, and only after Sutton had shot him in the arm. Hendly was a refugee from Mississippi, where he and his wife were hounded almost to death because they refused to join the rebels. Finally he escaped to Kansas. Whiskey and bad company, he said, were his ruin.

A large fire occurred at Jackson, Mich., on the 7th. The loss amounts to over $25,000.

A man named Moore was bitten some time last fall by a cur, supposed to be mad, but, in reality, suffering from the complaint known as the mad itch. Moore, who lives about a mile and a half from Indianopolis, became very uneasy, went to Terre Haute, and had Mrs. Taylor's mad stone applied. He was discharged after one or two applications; but the fear of hydrophobia so preyed upon his mind that he had no rest. Last Friday he died, exhibiting a singular state of nervous disorganization for some time prior to his death.

On the Bureau Valley Railroad, Dec. 28, near Snachwine, the engineer whistled a drove of horses off the track, when in great fright they ran down the track to the bridge and attempted to cross it on the ties, but made a bad failure of it, their legs slipping through and leaving them perfectly helpless. The brakemen and express agents then turned out with rails and pried them off the bridge into the mud below. One struck on his side and was able to hobble off with difficulty. One struck on its head and wasn't able to hobble at all, and one became crazy and started back to butt the engine off the track, but running against a connecting rod tore a hole in its throat, from the effects of which it bled to death.

The Adams Express car in the train between New York and New Haven, on the 6th, was robbed of about $500,000. The thieves left $140,000 on the floor of the car.

The Harrisburg Telegraph of the 8th says that two or three days ago—we believe on Friday—a lady living on the other side of the river, was informed by a thoughtless woman who wished to perpetrate a joke, that her husband had been killed on the railroad. Upon hearing the statement, the wife was so agitated that she fainted, and her system was so completely shocked that she died on Sunday. What must be the feelings of the thoughtless perpetrator of the falsehood which resulted so fatally?

By the explosion of a locomotive on the New Jersey Central Railroad on the 9th, 3 persons were killed.

A family in Brooklyn were recently poisoned by the use of musty flour. One person has died, and two are still dangerously ill.

The Wisconsin State Reform school was burned on the 10th. Loss $30,000.....A fire in Binghamton, N. Y. destroyed $50,000 worth of property.....By the burning of the barn of the Troy and Cohoes, N. Y., horse railroad, 7 cars and 31 horses were consumed.

Three men have been killed in London, by the manufacture of the so called "Pharaoh's Serpents"—the composition having exploded.

—A gentleman in Memphis had a watch stolen, for the recovery of which he offered $100 "and no question asked." The next day he was met in the street by a respectably dressed man, who invited him to step aside, handed him the watch, and received the $100.

A lady named Cutler, residing in South Fifth street, Brooklyn, has lately been robbed of about $1,000 worth of furniture, by, as she believed, spirits. It appears, however, that a graceless son was the thief, he confessing to the robbery while confined in the Penitentiary for another offence.

—That historical relic, "The Old Blue Bowl," holding thirty-six gallons, and which for so many years belonged to the Richmond Light Infantry Blues, was rescued from destruction on the ever memorable 3d of April by an ex-Captain of that famous old company. It is said that this bowl is upward of eighty years old, and during its "lifetime" has contained between one hundred and fifty and two hundred thousand gallons of egg-nog, julep, punch, toddy, &c.

—A clergyman, writing from Texas to the Post Office Department concerning a contract for carrying the mails, says he contributed in no way to the Confederate cause, except to pray for its success, and is in doubt whether, on that account, he can conscientiously take the test oath; "but," he adds, "as my prayers were not answered, I think they should not be considered as 'aid and comfort' given to the enemy."

A boy ten years of age, after an altercation with his elder brother, complained to their father of the injustice with which he had been treated. To the boy's great surprise, the father declared that the elder was in the right. This decision so affected the lad that he determined to put an end to his life, and told several of his playfellows that he would hang himself at a certain hour. He resolutely executed his purpose, and soon after was found hanging, quite dead, in his bedroom.

—It is the pleasing custom of Killimanjaro, in Africa, for the women to do all the trading; and they will not permit a man to make sales in the market place. "Do you think you are unmarried?" asked the irate lady; "why, what sort of a man are you?"

—The human body falls asleep by degrees, according to M. Cabinis, a French physiologist. The muscles of their legs and arms lose their power before those which support the head, and these last sooner than the muscles which support the back; and he illustrates this by the cases of persons who sleep on horseback or while they are standing or walking. He conceives that sense of sight sleeps first, then the sense of taste, next the sense of smell, and lastly, that of touch.

—In Ruthland, LaSalle county, on last Friday night, the citizens visited a grocery kept by a man named Herman, and after tying him to a post, went into the saloon, and finding that a family occupied the upper part, the belligerents took up a collection and satisfied their claims to the property and moved them out of the building. They then proceeded to cut down the corner posts with axes, burst in beer kegs and whiskey barrels, and knocked out the doors and windows, then hitched a rope about the roof and pulled the house down, chopped and stove it into kindling wood, completely demolishing it to the foundation.

The Duke and the Bishop. — When traveling, the Duke of Roquelair used a very mean equipage and dressed in a shabby manner. Passing through Lyons in this guise, he was observed by the bishop of the diocese, who was afflicted with an insatiable desire for news. The bishop, seeing a strange traveler of mean appearance, thought he had only a plebeian to deal with and wishing to gratify his ruling passion, cried out, "Hi, Hi!" Roquelaire immediately ordered his postillion to stop, and the curious prelate advancing to the carriage, demanded, "Where have you come from?" "Paris," was the reply. "What is there fresh in Paris?" "Green peas." "But what were the people saying when you came away?" "Vespers." "Goodness, man! who are you? What are you called?" "Ignorant and uneducated people call me Hi! Hi! but gentlemen term me the Duke de Roquelaire. Drive on postillion." The duke passed on, leaving the astonished bishop staring after the carriage.

.....A gentleman who was in the habit of larding his discourse with the expression, "I say," having been informed by a friend that a certain individual had made ill-mannered remarks upon this peculiarity, took the opportunity of addressing him in the following amusing style of rebuke: "I say, sir! I hear you say I say 'I say' at every word I say. Now sir, although I know I say 'I say' at every word I say, still, I say, sir, it is not for you to say that I say 'I say' at every word I say.

MY WIFE.

She who sleeps upon my heart,
Was the first to win it;
She who dreams upon my breast
Ever reigns within it.
She who kisses off my lips,
Wakes their warmest blessing;
She who rests within my arms
Feels their closest pressing.

Other days than these shall come—
Days that may be dreary—
Other hours shall greet us yet,
Hours that may be weary;
Still this heart shall be my throne,
Still th e breast my pillow;
Still these lips shall meet thine oft
As billow meeteth billow.

Sleep, then, on my happy heart,
Since thine love hath won it;
Dream, then, on my loyal breast,
None but thou hast done it;
And when age your bloom shall change,
With its wintry weather,
May we in the selfsame grave
Sleep and dream together.

Bleeding a Victim to Death.

A STARTLING STORY OF THE FRENCH POLICE.

BY J. HENRY HAYWARD.

The great efficiency of the French police system, as at present in operation, and as it was during the term of the First Napoleon, is too well known to need comment here; yet one may occasionally happen upon unrecorded incidents which, when thoroughly sifted, make it still more evident. Of such a character is the incident we are now about to relate.

It appears that, one dark and stormy day as a good old prelate, Denjorain by name, was hastening along the Rue La Bertandine, wrapped snugly up in his huge capuchin, he was accosted suddenly by a tall, strongly-built man, habited in a huge cloak and slouched hat, which completely concealed his face. He had alighted from a small, close-covered cab, which drew up to the walk just as the prelate was passing.

Singular as these proceedings may appear, they would have excited little or no wonder in his mind at the time, for such mysterious proceedings were then of an everyday occurrence, were it not that his attention was drawn more particularly thereto by the mysterious person, who placed himself directly before him, saying:

"You are Father Gagnice, I believe?"

"I am, my son; what would you have with me?" returned the worthy prelate, starting with surprise.

"I have come, father, a great distance to find you; and I now wish you to enter my cab and go with me."

"Go with you? Where?—and for what?"

"To attend the death-bed of a friend, who wishes the sacrament administered before departing from this life."

"Lead on, then, my man; I will accompany you; lead on."

The worthy prelate was never tardy in the discharge of the duties of his holy order.

"Thank you, father; but you must permit me to blindfold you!"

"But I'll permit nothing of the kind, my son," returned the old man, whose suspicions were now becoming aroused.

"But I say you must, most holy father!" was the deep, determined reply,

"I must nor will not!"

"You must, and will, or—die! For if you refuse and resist me, I will kill you!" said the man while drawing a small dirk from his cloak.

Our worthy friend, the prelate, was now thoroughly alarmed, but he tried hard to conceal this, by calmly inquiring:

"But why all this mystery, my son? Why this disguise?"

"I have no time, now, father, to explain, even if I would; but you shall learn all in time. And, further, to quiet your fears, for I see you are terrified—I do most solemnly swear, upon the cross of your rosary, that no harm shall come to you, provided you are discreet. There, now, come. Haste, for every moment to me seems an hour!"

"You mean, then, no harm shall come to me or mine?"

"I swear it!"

"Then lead on; I'll go, and submit to be blindfolded, too."

"This way, then, to the cab."

Saying which, the stranger hastily led the old man to the vehicle, shoved him in, then, entering himself, closed the door and fastened it on the inside, gave the word to the driver, and away they went.

"Now, father," continued he, "hold your head down;" with which he drew from his pocket a handkerchief, folded it neatly upon his knee, and bound it firmly over the closed eyes of the old man, who submitted to it in perfect silence; and then again the stranger spoke:

"And now, most holy father, you must submit to another indignity—if so you call it!"

"And what is that, my son?"

"This: you must swear that you will never divulge one word, look or gesture you may see or hear in your present adventure. Do you understand and consent?"

"I do, but will not. I am willing to comply with everything I conceive to be essential to the happiness of my children; but in this I neither see reason nor necessity, and therefore prefer to use my own discretion in the matter."

"But you have no choice, father, in this case."

"I will exercise one, nevertheless."

"I mean," returned the stranger, in that same deep, determined tone of voice, "if you insist on my being more explicit, that I will not permit you to exercise any choice!"

"But I will, in this respect, for in these matters I am not only accountable to my God, but also to my church, my son."

With this, the stranger paused for a while as if in deep thought, and then, as if having come to some definite resolve, replied:

"Well, well; I suppose in this matter you may have your own way; but if you ever divulge a word outside your sanctuary, you die! Do you hear, most holy father?"

"I do."

"And further, even if you do, it will avail you naught, for these very precautions will render you harmless."

"True, true," muttered the old man, with which both relapsed into silence, while the carriage went rumbling and rolling along. The rain still came down in torrents, while ever and anon a deep peal of thunder made everything tremble again.

"All things temporal must have an end," thought the padre, "and so must this ride eventually."

At this moment, as if in confirmation of his soliloquy, the carriage did stop, but where, he was, of course, quite unable to judge.

"Prepare to alight, father," said the stranger.

"I am ready, my son."

"Come, then."

Saying which, the stranger took the priest, still hooded, by the arm, and thus helped him to descend; then led him across the stone-paved walk, by which our friend (who was keenly alive to every sign that would indicate his whereabouts) at once conjectured that he was yet within the precincts of Paris—and he was right; thence up a huge pair of stone steps, then through a door—which he also rightly concluded was the front entrance—which was immediately closed by the person who admitted them.

Nothing further passed between them as they went in and out, up and down through the house, till presently they halted before a door, and in a low voice the stranger said:

"I am now about to admit you to the presence of the invalid. When you hear the door shut, take off the bandage; when you get through, ring the little bell you will find on the table, and I will come. Now, father, go in;" saying which, the mask opened the door, showed our old friend in, and then hastily but safely closed it, and was gone.

Now comes the singular part of our story. No sooner did the priest find that the door was closed, than he hastily slipped the handkerchief off, and attempted to gaze around, but the effect of the light was so powerful for a few seconds that he was compelled to cover them again out of sheer pain. Gradually, however, his eyes became accustomed to the natural light, and they opened wide indeed with surprise when they beheld the splendor of the apartment he was in. The furniture and decorations were of the most superb and costly kind, while the most refined taste and scrupulous care was manifested in the order and arrangement of each and every article. Presently his gaze turned to a part of the room he had not yet examined, and as he naturally enough supposed, there stood a splendid ebony-wood bedstead, inlaid with pearl, and covered with a counterpane of white silk of the most elaborate manufacture, beneath which, between sheets of the finest linen, with head bolstered up with pillows of down, reclined the form of as fair a creature as had ever delighted the old man's gaze.

She bent upon him a long and pensive glance, which appealed at once to the old prelate's heart, but finding at length, that she did not intend to speak first, he lightly approached her side, saying in subdued tones—

"Madam, I am the priest, come to confess you, and give you absolution, through the mercy of Jesus Christ, and his apostle Peter. Madam, are you ready—but," continued he while bending upon her a look of mingled surprise and penetration—"but you surely are not going to die, it must be a mistake—you still bear the bloom of health in your cheek, your eyes still glisten—and now you smile as never smiled a being on death's bed before."

"And yet, father," replied she in the bed, "and yet I am even now on the very verge of the grave!"

"Impossible! I have beheld hundreds on the verge of the grave, but never before one like you. Why, your voice, madam, so sweet and clear, so strong, belies the supposition."

"And yet my words are true."

"Ah!" muttered our old friend to himself, while a smile of gratification for an instant illumined his countenance—"doubtlessly, she is a hypochondriac. She is a fit object for the physician, but not for the priest." Then turning to her he continued aloud—

"Madam, is it your determination that I shall confess you?"

"Such is my resolve, father, though heaven and my conscience know I have but little to confess—let the world say what it may—father, I see by your look of surprise—your kindly solicitude, that—that you—oh! you are not—are you?"

"Not what, daughter—not what?" and the padre began to look slightly alarmed.

"Yes—yes, I am certain you are not an accomplice of—of my kinsman!"

"Accomplice?"

"Yes—yes, you know nothing of this—you are not an accomplice?"

"Madam, you mystify me very much—your mind is evidently disordered—I must depart—this is no place for me;" and he started towards the bell.

"Oh, no, no! In the name of heaven I implore you—stay. If you have any mercy do not ring that bell!—do not leave me!"

"Madam, your manner is most incomprehensible! What do you mean? I am led to believe you mad; and yet your manner and language is rational."

"Mad? Mon Dieu! I wonder that I am not. No, no, I am not mad! but father, swear to me that you are not an accomplice of my kinsman."

It must be understood that all this dialogue was carried on in a low, subdued voice, not much above a whisper, though excited and animated in the extreme; and it was as much with the design of assuming a more easy position—for he had been bending over the bed all this while—as it was to enable him to hear better, that the prelate softly drew a chair to her side, and seated himself, while saying:

"Daughter, there is evidently some mystery here, and I would fathom it. Now, in the first place, who is this kinsman you speak of? he wearing the cloak? Speak, and fear not."

"Yes—yes, 'tis he——"

"Well, I am no accomplice of his."

"Oh, do you speak truly?" and she bent upon him a glance of such deep supplication that his heart was touched.

"Daughter, believe me. My words are the words of truth!"

"Oh! God, I thank thee! Father, can you save me? See, I am young—too young die."

"Willingly, if it is in my power; but you forget, I am perfectly ignorant of your situation. Now, if would be more plain—more explicit."

"I will—you shall know all—look!" Up to this time, it should be remembered, she had remained closely covered up to the neck by the counterpane; but now, as she spoke, she violently threw the cover from her but half-robed person and bare arms, one of which she then held up to his startled gaze, pointing the while, with the trembling hand of the other, to a blood-dyed bandage that encircled it, just above the elbow.

"Look! Do you see that, father? From that wound my precious life is to pour out—by that means I am to die!"

"Are you frantic, woman? What do you mean?"

"Listen!—disturb me not and you shall hear all: You will doubtlessly judge by all this splendor you see in these apartments, that I am one of the so-called royalists, or nobility of France, recalled by an edict of the present Emperor Napoleon—and rightly, too, for I am—further, you are aware, that there have lately been several attempts made by our party to assassinate the emperor, or, at least, such is the report? Also, that it is suspected, that even at this moment, there are several secret societies of conspirators now plotting for the same object? Well, it is because I chanced to discover the dastardly purposes of one of these despicable cliques, and betrayed that knowledge to the proper source, that I am now doomed to suffe this death."

"Oh, impossible!"

"Nay, say not so, father, for such is the truth."

"But, how then is it possible that you have been prevailed upon to betray your people, and your own interest so much?" and the old man looked incredulous.

"Truly, it does seem improbable, and I must tell all."

"Certainly!" and he looked, as he was, gratified at the prospect of having his suspicions proved false.

"Yes, I will soon tell you that," continued she, while a faint blush for an instant suffused her fair cheek. "'Tis thus; though born, as I have said, a loyalist, I am one no longer at heart, for I loved, and he who taught me to love, taught me also to love liberty better than all the vain pomp and display of despotism; for he is one of the people—an humble sous lieutenant, in the army of Napoleon. 'Twas my love for him that prompted me to divulge a secret, which involves even a kinsman, who, urged on by revenge, and I fear, also, on a hope to thus claim all I possess on earth, in company with his associates, sat in judgment on my declared crime, and doomed me to be bled to death."

"Most horrible! but have you no parents, brothers, or family to interpose, and save you?"

"None—none. All fell victims to the wrath of the republicans, all—all are gone!"

"But, how is it I am called in to confess you? truly, here seems to be some regard for your feelings and welfare!" and again a shadow flitted over the grave countenance of the cautious and farseeing priest.

"Oh, do you still doubt me? Listen, it was thus: They had commenced their hellish deed, attended by a fiendish physician, who even bled me till I fainted, when the flow was stopped, and I revived; but, during that fainting spell, the spirit of my mother appeared to me, and charged me to be composed, for in that lay my salvation! I did not understand it then, but I do now, for I then thought she meant my spiritual salvation, whereas it now proves, she meant my life. However, upon recovering, I requested that a confessor might be sent for. They all at once abruptly objected, till at length I melted their hard hearts, though apparently a republican, and after much debate concluded to send for you. My brother then departed, and you came."

"Most wonderful!"

"You are here, father, by the direct interposition of Providence to save me—will you do it?"

"I will!" exclaimed our friend, with remarked emphasis, for he now felt that he was really an instrument in the hands of God. "If you can but succeed in delaying their hellish work one half hour, you shall be saved. But, did they not make you swear to reveal aught to me?"

"They did; but on this question of life, I deemed such perjury no sin."

"It is not, and I absolve you. And now tell me where you are—that is, in what street is this residence, for I——"

"That I cannot, father, for I, too, like you, was brought here blindfolded, and by force."

"Ah! that is a serious obstacle. I know not where I am, Do these windows look into the street?"

"No, they are blocked in on all sides, though open to the light of heaven."

"Ah! what am I to do?" and the old man mused for a while with serious aspect, but at length he exclaimed—

"I have it—I have it! Quick! give me a piece of the blood-stained bandage about your arm there quick! And with eager hand he drew out a penknife from beneath his robes, and cut off a piece, saying, in hurried tones, "Now do you manage, while I am gone, to defer their operations for half an hour—just one half hour—and you are saved!"

As he ceased, he replaced his knife, put the bandage over his eyes, but fixed it so he could still see a little in advance of his path; then, crushing the bloody bandage close within his hand, which was then thrust under his cloak, he took his position by the table, and saying,

"Take courage, daughter, you shall be saved!" he rang the bell. The door instantly opened, and in stalked the masked stranger.

"Are you done, father?" said he.

"I have, my son; she has confessed."

"Well and good. There is the pay for your trouble."

Saying which he placed a purse, weighing heavy, of gold into the priest's hand, and then led him forth through the doorway, which was then closed and locked after him; they then proceeded down several flights of stairs, through halls, around turnings, till, suddenly, the priest beheld the light of the hall entrance glancing through on the floor at his feet. Seeing this, he slightly elevated his head that he might see the door in advance. At a glance he saw that it was large, massive, with small, fluted columns each side between it and the wall.

This was just as he expected, and just as he wanted it, as will be seen; for, as he reached the door, which was opened, as before, by a servant in livery, who stood to one side and behind it, as was the custom, to let them pass out, he suddenly pretended to trip, and to fall forward, and by this means forced his conductor ahead of him, at the same time catching for the doorcase, as if to stop his fall, succeeded in slipping the blood-stained bandage between it and the side pillar without being observed. Excusing his awkwardness, he grasped his conductor's arm again, and passed out to the cab, into which both then seated themselves, and once more they were driven rapidly along.

"At what place would you prefer to be set down?" inquired the stranger.

"At the Barricade St. Antoine."

"It shall be so. By-the-bye, most holy father, was the fair lady very meek and penitent?"

"Seek not to know the secrets of the church, my son."

"Ha! ha! no delicate amours, hey, father?"

"My son, your language is sacriligeous."

"Well, I suppose it is, by Heaven! though it seems a pity that she must die! Death is a sad fellow to rob man of such charms," and he sighed with not a little feeling; then, looking up continued, "You remember, father, if you dare divulge one word or look."

"Oh! fear not, my son, I remember."

"'Tis well. Ah! here we are, just where you wished to stop." Then, taking the bandage hastily from our friend's eyes, he directed him to alight, which he did, then bade him adieu, shut the cab door, gave the word to the driver, and was out of sight ere the old man had well recovered the use of his eyes. When he had, however, he merely glanced up at the sky, saw that it still stormed, shook his head, hailed a passing cab, and jumped in, saying—

"To the Prefect of Police, in haste," and away he went.

We will now follow the cab containing the masked stranger, which at once carried him back from whence it started, and hastily alighting, he entered; but, instead of proceeding to the chamber of death, as before, he now opened the door of a room situated on the first floor, in which he found seated three persons of distinguished appearance; they were quietly partaking of wine beside a table.

"All is well," said he, doffing the mask, and revealing a face anything but handsome, though of a somewhat stern and forbidding expression.

"But do you think the priest will keep a still tongue in his head?" inquired one, who in his dress, denoted the physician.

"Undoubtedly; he is one of us, and further, I well nigh scared him out of his skin; so there is nothing to fear from him. But, but I dread this work."

"Be cautious, compt—don't waver—remember our oath. It must be done. Already our President and nine members are in the clutches of the police, and were it for nought else but revenge I would kill her," exclaimed one of the three, with all the vehemence and impetuosity of a Frenchman

"Well, well, to your work, then; but, doctor, you say she will die easy."

"Yes, very similar to a fainting fit, nothing more—oh, yes, quite easy."

"That's one blessing. Away then; I cannot go with you to witness it."

"It is just as well; so make yourself easy; we will be with you soon."

With which all three left the room, leaving the compt looking sad and dejected enough, for, be it known, he did really love—that is, as far as he was capable of loving—his fair kinswoman, and had actually proffered her his hand in marraige; in doing which, however, he had more than one object; first, of course, he desired to gratify his passion, and this was most apparent; but under all was the secret purpose of (as she had justly suspected) securing to himself her wealth, into the possession of which, it should be here remarked, she had been (though it was once confiscated) permanently reinstated by the emperor, who, it will be remembered, adopted this delicate policy to ingratiate himself into the good graces of the nobility, whom he was anxious to have recognized him as emperor if not king of France, hence the wealth of our heroine, of which we speak, and which, failing to gain by marriage, the compt hoped to gain by her death, and with this pleasing prospect he now consoled himself while the others proceeded to the chamber of death into we find them assembled, all masked, for they dreaded the gaze of their victim.

She seemed perfectly calm when they entered, apparantly engaged in prayer, which they were loth to interrupt, so they in silence stood by, wailing for her to finish her devotions.

Very near half an hour had elapsed since the priest had left her presence, and it was with increasing hope that each moment now passed; till at length the physician became impatient, jingled his probe and scalpel together, and finally actually bade her haste. She pleaded, and was again permitted to go on until again interrupted, and again she pleaded a moment more; but he protested, and presently bade his assistants advance with the basin, which was placed beside the bed. Then directing each to lay hold of her frame on either side, he seized hold of her arm, and was in the very act of re-opening the wound, when the door opened, and in walked—not the count as they had supposed, but a very gentlemanly sort of a person, all smiles and graces, who excused himself for the intrusion. Then drawing from his huge pocket three handcuffs, two of which he very calmly laid on the table, the other of which he quietly slipped on the wrists of the dumfounded M. D., begging his pardon the while, and then turning to the remaining two, who were too terrified to flee, he used them precisely in the same way, and then handed them over to several similar smiling individuals, who just then appeared at the door with the count in custody. They all knew their fate, and submitted without a murmur.

As they passed down the hall, they were met by their friend the priest, who politely saluted the compt with a bow, and then passed on to the chamber.

Here he found the fair creature he had so marvelously rescued from certain death. But she was insensible through a combination of exhaustion, terror and joy. He was not long in restoring her, and then—well, we shall not pause here to describe the scene which ensued, or attempt to repeat the many words of thanks and gratitude which she poured out on the worthy priest, who was to tell the truth as happy as she. Suffice it to say that they parted very good friends, and a short time after he officiated at a marriage, in which it was reported by the crowds of Republicans who so delighted to level all distinctions that a sous lieutenant was wedded to a countess of great wealth, and that report, it is unnecessary to say, was true.

The count and his companions were incarcerated in jail, and that was the last that was ever heard of them. Hence it will be seen how rapid and sure are the operations of the French police, who, with no other clue than the mere presence of a bit of blood stained bandage in the doorway of a house somewhere within the limits of Paris succeeded in the short space of half an hour in ferreting out and bringing the offender of the law to its tribunal.

Remarkable Escapes of Eminent Men.

Some years ago a young man holding a subordinate position in the East India Company's service, twice attempted to deprive himself of life by snapping a loaded pistol at his head. Each time the pistol missed fire. A friend entering his room shortly afterward, he requested him to fire it out of the window; it then went off without any difficulty. Satisfied thus that the weapon had been duly primed and loaded, the young man sprang up, exclaiming, "I must be reserved for something great!" and from that moment gave up the idea of suicide, which for some time previous had been uppermost in his thoughts. That young man afterward became Lord Clive.

Two brothers were on one occasion walking together when a violent storm of thunder and lightning overtook them. One was struck dead on the spot, the other was spared; else would the name of the great reformer, Martin Luther, have been unknown to mankind.

The holy St. Augustine, having to preach at a distant town, took with him a guide, who by some unaccountable means mistook the usual road and fell into a by path. He afterward discovered that his enemies, having heard of his movements, had placed themselves in the proper road with the design of murdering him.

Bacon, the sculptor, when a tender boy of five years old, fell into the pit of a soap boiler, and must have perished, had not a workman, just entering the yard, observed the top of his head, and immediately delivered him.

When Oliver Cromwell was an infant, a monkey snatched him from his cradle, leaped with him through a garret window, and ran along the leads of the house. The utmost alarm was excited among the inmates, and various were the devices used to rescue the child from the guardianship of his newly-found protector All were unavailing; his would-be rescuers had lost courage, and were in despair of ever seeing the baby alive again, when the monkey quietly retraced its steps and deposited its burden safely on the bed. On a subsequent occasion the waters had well-nigh quenched his insatiable ambition. He fell into a deep pond, from drowning in which a clergyman named Johnson was the sole instrument of his rescue.

At the siege of Leicester, a young soldier, about seventeen years of age, was drawn out for sentry duty. One of his comrades was very anxious to take his place. No objection was made, and the man went. He was shot dead while on guard. The young man first drawn afterward became the author of the "Pilgrim's Progress."

Doddridge, when born, was so weakly an infant it was believed to be dead. A nurse standing by fancied she saw some signs of vitality. Thus the feeble spark of life was saved from being extinguished, and an eminent author and consistent Christian preserved to the world.

John Wesley, when a child, was only just preserved from fire. Almost the moment after he was rescued, the roof of the house where he had been, fell in. Of Philip Henry a similar instance is recorded.

John Knox, the renowned Scotch reformer, was always wont to sit at the head of the table with his back to the window. On one particular evening, without, however, being able to account for it, he would neither himself sit in the chair nor permit any one else to occupy his place. That very night a bullet was shot in at the window, purposely to kill him; it grazed the chair in which he sat, and made a hole in the foot of a candlestick on the table.

Many years have now elapsed since three subalterns might have been seen struggling in the water off St. Helena; one of them, peculiarly helpless, was fast succumbing. He was saved, to live as Arthur Wellesley, Duke of Wellington.

The life of John Newton is but the history of a series of marvellous deliverances. As a youth he had agreed to accompany some friends on board of a man-of-war. He arrived too late; the boat in which his friends had gone was capsized and all its occupants drowned. On another occasion, when Tide Surveyor in the port of Liverpool, some business had detained him, so that he came to his boat much later than usual, to the great surprise of those who were in the habit of observing his then undeviating punctuality. He went out in the boat as heretofore to inspect a ship, which blew up before he reached her. Had he left the shore a few minutes sooner he must have perished with the rest on board.

The Adams Express Robbery.

One of the most daring and successful robberies we have ever been called upon to chronicle, occurred last Saturday evening on the express train between New York and Boston, which leaves the former city at 8, and arrives here at 11 o'clock. The facts, so far as we have been able to learn them, are these: In this train was an iron car belonging to the express company, the only one on the road, in which was placed all the express bundles, and on this occasion, three small iron safes, weighing about 180 pounds each, one of which belonged to the Harnden Express company, and the other two to the Adams Express company, and all containing an immense amount of treasure.

The car had two doors, one on each side, and after the property was put in, these were locked with padlocks. The car was then run out from the depot, where it remained some 25 or 30 minutes, when it was started on its passage for Boston, On its arrival in that city, Conductor Patterson noticed one of the doors of the car a little open, and in an instant knew that something was wrong, as it is the rule of the company not to open the car until its arrival in Hartford, when it is opened, and money packages taken aboard and put off. The car is also opened in Worcester and Springfield, and at no other places on the route between New York and Boston.

Seeing that the door was open, an examination of the car and contents was instantly made, and it was found that the door had been pried open by an iron bar, the padlock broken off, and that the robbers had entered the car, and by means of an iron bar, forced open the doors of the two safes belonging to the Adams Express company, and taken out all their contents. They had torn open all the envelopes, appropriating to themselves the contents, except those of two packages, leaving the way-bills and envelopes strewn about the floor. There were about a hundred envelopes thus opened, but of the amount they contained, we have not yet learned. Of the two packages the contents of which they did not take, one contained 80 bills of $1,000 each, the same being greenback; the other was a roll about twn inches in diameter, containing $50,000 in fine twenty bonds, making in all $130,000 which they left behind. These were only two packages of about 100 that were overhaulcd. The greenbacks were evicently lost among the papers on the floor as the package was small, but the bonds it would seem, did not suit the fancy of the robbers, being property not so readily disposed of as bank bills.

The greenbacks were in a little drawer in the safe, which was quite full. The package was found on the floor with one corner torn off. It is thought from its jammed appearance, that in opening the drawer, the package got caught so as to tear off the corner of the paper covering, and fell on the floor unobserved. The roll of bonds had the outside paper torn down, sufficient to disclose the contents of the package. That too, was found on the floor. The safe belonging to the Harnden Company, was undisturbed. When and where the company got into the car, is unknown, but it seems impossible that it should have been done at any other place than New York, as the train stops but a few moments at any station after leaving that place until its arrival here. It is thought probable that they got into the car while it was waiting on the track to be hitched on and taken down to the tunnel.

The car is the same in size as an ordinary box freight car. It is built with an iron framework sheathed over with thick sheet iron plates riveted together, and is so closely made that a light placed inside would not be seen if the doors were closed. A messenger always accompanies the car, but usually stays in the baggage car. It is his business to keep watch of the car, and to look and unlock it at the stations where it is opened. The robbers probably got quietly aboard at New York, provided with dark lanterns and all the necessary tools, and knowing the rules in regard to the train, leisurley helped themselves to a good sized fortune, and then watched their opportunity, and as quietly effected a landing. The telegraph lines between New York and Boston were kept busy yesterday by the company and a large number of messages were transmitted, indicatidg that strenuous efforts were being made to recover the property and secure the robbers.

The scene in the car when opened in the city, must have been quite singular. The floor was strewn with valuables, which the thieves had rejected or over looked. United States bonds in considerable numbers lay around loose. A bag of pennies was picked up, and a quantity of silver foil lay upon the floor; and the envelopes and wrappings of the valuable packages stolen, were scattered about. Seeing something apparantly more substantial than the other empty wrappers, a gentleman asked, "Isn't that money?" and picked up $80,000 at one handful. The thieves left a dark lantern. It is reported that $58,000 of the treasure taken, was in gold.

In the amount taken, as well as the boldness and success of the operation, this is one of the most remarkable robberies on record. Last evening Superintendent Sanford and Assistant Superintendent Spooner of Bridgeport, came here with some detectives, and held a consultation with some of the express officers at the New Haven House. The way-bills, for the missing treasure sent on Saturday night, were brought up and examined, and Mr. Sanford telegraphed to the Associated Press that the loss was not less than $500,000 in bills, bonds, etc. We presume the precise amount is not yet known, but half a million is a pretty large sum for one night's work.

The thieves must have studied their job pretty thoroughly. The messenger who came with this car should have examined its fastenings at every station. We believe he states that he neglected to do so except at Bridgeport, and then only on the side nearest the depot. Now it happens that at all the stations coming from New York, the platform is on the left hand side, while the thieves broke in at the right hand door, and thus the robbery was not discovered until the train reached this city. The rumor that the telegraph wires were cut, is incorrect. Where the thieves left the train is not yet known. But with the telegraph wires in active operation, it would seem probable that they must sooner or later be apprehended.

NEW YORK, Jan 10.

Three persons implicated in the robbery of the Adams Express company's safe on the train from New York to Boston, have been captured. They were traced by Mr. Sanford, the agent, and some private detectives acting under his order. Two of the parties were arrested at Norwalk, R. I., and the other at a low house in this city. Nearly three-fourths of the money was found in the latter's possession. The whole amount taken from the safes, did not exceed $550,000.

According to later accounts, the whole amount of money recovered from the Adams Express robbers, is $250,000 and four men are under arrest as the robbers.

New Haven papers this morning, contain particulars of the arrest of the robbers of the Adams Express. On Saturday evening, three men called at a hotel in Stamford, and registered their names—two of them as Lockwood, and the other as Clark. Their action towards each other, at first, was that of strangers, and no one supposed they were acquainted. They endeavored to hire a carriage to Norwalk but were unable to do so. After failing to obtain a carriage, they were seen to converse together as if acquainted, and their manner excited suspicion. They remained all night in Stamford, and the next morning took the train to Norwalk. On their arrival at Norwalk, they went up on the hill back of the village to an old shoemaker's named Tristam, who is an uncle of Clark. Here they stopped over night and returned to the village on Monday. On Monday morning, the old man Tristam came down with a bundle which appeared to be pretty heavy, and which he refused to have checked, and was also careful to keep in his hand all the way to New York, whence he took it. Suspicion having fallen upon him, word was sent to New York, and Tristam was arrested, but not until after he had disposed of his bundle. Tristam's house was searched, and the two Lockwoods were arrested, but not until after the one calling himself Clark had made his escape. When Tristam came to New York, he left his bag containing gold and some currency, with a man in Division street, who has been arrested. The whole sum recovered is $258,000 in currency value. Some burglar's tools, a gold watch that was in one of the safes, and some other property were found in the possession of the men who were arrested at Tristam's house.

Latest accounts say that both the amounts stolen and recovered, are much exaggerated in the above statement.

"Mark Twain"—The Pioneers' Ball.

It was estimated that four hundred persons were present at the ball. the gentlemen wore the orthodox costume for such occasions and the ladies were dressed the best they knew how. N. B. Most of these ladies were pretty, and some of them absolutely beautiful. Four out of every five ladies present were pretty. The ratio of the Colfax party [of which our distinguished fellow citizen, Lieut. Gov. Bross, was a member, was two out of every five. I always keep run of these things. While upon this department of the subject, I may as well tarry a moment and furnish you with descriptions of some of the most noticeable costumes.

Mrs. W. M. was attired in an elegant pate de foie gras, made expressly for her, and was greatly admired.

Miss S. had her hair done up. She was the centre of attraction for the gentlemen, and the envy of all ladies.

Miss G. W. was tastefully dressed in a tout ensemble, and was greeted with deafening applause wherever she went.

Mrs. C. N. was superbly arrayed in white kid gloves. Her modest and engaging manner accorded well with the unpretending simplicity of her costume, and caused her to be regarded with absorbing interest by every one.

The charming Miss M. M. B. appeared n a thrilling waterfall, whose exceeding grace and volume compelled the homage of pioneers and emigrants alike. How beautiful she was.

The queenly Mrs. L. B. was attractively attired in her new and beautifully false teeth, and the bon jour effect they naturally produced was heightened by her enchanting and well sustained smile. The manner of this lady is charmingly pensive and melancholy, and her troops of admirers desired no greater happiness than to get on the scent of her sozodont-sweetened sighs and track her through her sinuous course among the gay and restless multitude.

Miss R. P., with that repugnance to ostentation in dress, which is so peculiar to her, was attired in a simple white lace collar, fastened with a neat pearl button solitaire. The fine contrast between the sparkling vivacity of her natural optic and the steadfast attentiveness of her placid glass eye was the subject of general and enthusiastic remark.

The radient and sylph-like Mrs. T., late of your State, wore hoops. She showed to good advantage, and created a sensation wherever she appeared.

Miss C. L. B. had her fine nose elegantly enamelled, and the easy grace with which she blew it from time to time marked her as a cultivated and accomplished woman of the world; its exquisitely modulated tone excited th admiration of all who had the happiness to hear it, &c., &c., &c.—San Francisco paper.

THE POETRY OF THE BARN-FOWL.—"Where is there a more magnificent bird than the Rooster? What a lofty air! What a spirited poise of the head! Note his elaborately, scalloped comb, stately steppings, the little, quick graceful motions of his arching neck. Mark his brilliant plumage, smooth and lustrous as satin, soft as floss silk. What necklace of a Duchess ever surpassed in beauty the circle of feathers which he wears, layer shooting over layer, up and down, hither and thither, an amber waterfall, swift and soundless as the light, but never disturbing the matchless order of his array? What plume from African deserts can rival the rich hues, the graceful curves, and the palm-like erectness of his tail? All his colors are tropical in depth and intensity. With every quick motion the tints change as in a prism, and each that is more splendid than the last: green more beautiful than any green, except that on a duck's neck; brown infiltrated with gold, and ranging through the whole gamut of its possibilities. I am not sure that the last is correct in point of expression, but it is correct in point of sense, as any one who ever saw a red rooster will bear witness.

"Hens are not intrinsically handsome, but they abundantly prove the truth of the old adage, 'Handsome is that handsome does.' Lord Kaimes describes one kind of beauty as that founded on the relations of objects. And I am sure that the relations of a hen to a dozen fair, white, pure eggs, and the relations of those eggs to puddings and custards, and the twenty-five cents which they can have for the asking, make even an ungainly hen, like many heroines in novels, 'not beautiful, but very interesting.' 'Twenty thousand dollars,' said a connoisseur in such matters, 'is a handsome feature in any lady's face.' And the 'cut-cut-ca-d-a-h-cut' of a hen whose word is as good as her bond for an egg a day, is a handsome feature in any bird's coat.—Gail Hamilton.

FOOLS NOT ALL DEAD IN FRANCE.—A French lady advertised some time ago in the Parisian journals, under the initials A. C., that she was young, handsome and worth two millions, and was anxious to get married, but did not care whether her husband was rich or poor. She invited the aspirants to her hand to send their photographs. A month afterward, having in the meantime received fifteen hundred applications she started a journal, soliciting subscriptions from all her would-be-husbands, and promising to publish her reply to the respective candidates in her new journal. She immediately received several thousand francs, the aggregate amount of subscription money, and forthwith published all the letters. The journal ceasing to appear after the first, and it seemed last issue, the befooled parties now appealed to the court, where the trial of the ingenious lady has taken place. Among the most spicy letters is that of a drum major, who declares himself ready for all the sacrifices, including his post in his regiment, provided he can secure Mlle. A. C. and two millions. A cook writes to her: "My phisique is admirable. Mademoiselle, and my two sisters are milliners. Your two millions would make us kings of France." Among the amateurs of this double-millioned woman are not a few persons occupying high stations, who thus find their matrionial ambitions rather awkwardly exposed.

.....An Irish peasant being asked why he permitted his pig to take up his quarters with the family made an answer abounding in satiracal naivete. "Why not? Don't the place afford every convenience that a pig can require?"

New Method of Rolling Iron.

A recent invention of a new method of rolling iron is one of the most important yet made for the working of this useful metal. It consists of a process for rolling iron into irregular shapes, by which checkered surfaces, projections and depressions can be obtained with the same facility as plain surfaces have heretofore been produced. This result is accomplished by means of adjustable discs, of any desirable pattern, placed upon ordinary rollers, which leave upon the bars drawn through them the impress of the figures which they bear. Instead of solid rolls turned with grooves and peripheries in the ordinary manner, the inventor uses cast or wrought iron spindles, on which are slipped cast iron or steel rings or discs, forming grooves and peripheries corresponding to those of ordinary rolls, and susceptible of an almost infinite variety of combinations. The spindles are allowed to project beyond the housings of one side, thus giving an opportunity for placing upon them every variety of pattern discs, and requiring but very few minutes to effect any desired change. Thus one set of spindles, with their accompanying discs, will do the work of a large number of rolls constructed in the old solid form; and fractures of grooves or peripheries can be easily repaired without the loss of the remaining portion of the rolls—an advantage which will be readily acknowledged by all the iron workers. Unusual forms can also be made quickly and cheaply, since it is only necessary to cut the simple and comparatively inexpensive discs for them; whereas by the old method entirely new rollers must be made for each new form demanded, and it is impossible to obtain irregular surfaces.—Boston Advertiser.

Importance of Western Trade.

Gov. Bullock of Massachusetts, in his recent inaugural, thus refers to the necessity of greater facilities for communication between the west and New England:

"There can be no doubt that new facilities and new means of transportation between the West and East are now absolutely needed. Our lines of prosperity and growth are the parallels of latitude which connect us with the young and rich empire of the mine, and stock, and produce lying around the lakes and still beyond. The people of Massachusetts, compact, manufacturing, and commercial, must have more thoroughfares through which the currents of trade and life may pass to and fro unobstructed and ceaseless between the Atlantic and the national granaries, or they will at no distant period touch alike her wharves and her workshops. Let us avert the day in which our Commonwealth shall become chiefly a school-house for the West, and a homestead over which time shall leave silently and two soon the marks of dilapidation. Any policy which is not broad enough to secure to us a New England having a proper share in the benefits of this new opening era of the West, be assured, will not receive the approval of the next generation."

—The Mobile and Ohio Railroad (says a Southern correspondent), is in better order, and better managed than any other Southern railroad, but the entire railroad interest became so demoralized during the war, that trains can nowhere be run with any degree of accuracy. Operatives care little for the interests of their employers and nothing for the comfort of passengers. They stop when they please, and as long as they please, notwithstanding the efforts of the officers, who, upon the Baltimore and Ohio road, at least, are arduous in exertions to effect a thorough reform and to accommodate passengers. The worst of the matter is, it is almost impossible to procure suitable, competent men, and companies are obliged to put up with what they cannot remedy.

—The railway rivalry and warfare in Congress has fairly commenced. Several great enterprises, among them the New York and Washington Air Line, are to be pushed this session. It is said Mr. Sumner's bill, introduced in the Senate, is understood as a blow at the New Jersey Railway. It provides that every railway company in the United States, whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, be and are hereby authorized to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges and ferries, all freight, property, mails, passengers, troops, and government supplies on their way from any State, and to receive compensation therefor.

—There is a scheme on foot, and it is said by a Cairo paper to be a "fixed fact," to build a broad gauge railroad from Vincennes, an extension of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, to the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, crossing at Cairo by means of either a bridge or tunnel, then extending southwestward along the route of the Cairo and Fulton Railroad, through the interior of Arkansas across the headwaters of the Red river, and continuing onward through central or northern Texas to the Rio Grande, and thence by the already surveyed route of the Southern Pacific road, through the Great Pass of the Rocky Mountains, to the acific coast.

—Some days ago the necessary papers were filed in the Treasury Department, showing that forty miles of the second division of the Kansas Pacific Railroad had been completed, and application was accordingly made for the $640,000 of bonds. Since the above, the representatives of another interest have presented

The Science of Health!

Every Man his own Physician.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS,

AND

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

Disorders of the stomach, Liver & Bowels.

The Stomach is the great centre which influences the health of the whole of the system—Abused or debilitated by excess—Indigestion, offensive breath and physical prostration are the natural consequences. Allied to the brain, it is the source of headaches, mental depression, nervous complaints and unrefreshing sleep. The liver becomes affected and generates bilious disorders, pains in the side &c. The bowels sympathize by Costiveness, Diarrhœa and Dysentry. The principal action of these Pills is on the stomach and the liver, lungs, bowels and kidneys participate in their reinvigorative and regenerative operation.

Erysipelas and Salt Rheum.

Are two of the most common and virulent disorders prevalent on this continent, to these the Ointment is especially antagonistic its modus operandi is first to eradicate the venom and then complete the cure.

Bad Legs, Old Sores, and Ulcers,

Cases of many years' standing, that have perticiaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Eruptions on the Skin,

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic diseases, are eradicated and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Female Complaints.

Whether in the young or old, married or single, at the dawn of Womanhood, or the turn of life, these tonic medicines display so decided an influence that a marked improvement is soon perceptible in the health of the patient. Being a purely vegetable preparation they are safe and reliable remedy for all classes of females in every condition of health and station of life.

Piles and Fistula

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healing qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills should be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Mercurial Eruptions,	Swelled Glands
Sprains,	Burns,	Piles,
Sore Legs,	Stiff Joints,	Chapped Hands
Tetter,	Rheumatism,	Sore Breasts,
Chilblains,	Ringworm,	Sore Heads,

CAUTION—None are genuine unless the words "HOLLOWAY, NEW YORK AND LONDON," are discernable as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

It is a historical fact that doves were employed as messengers. Noah used them from his ordinary ark, and at a later period lovers sent their letters by the same conveyance. ☞ No advertisement considered less than one square. Transient advertisements must be paid for in advance. Advertisements unaccompanied with directions for the number of insertions, will be continued until ordered out, and charged accordingly. Business cards of five lines, or less, inserted at $3.50 per year.
☞ Work neatly executed at this office. Charges reasonable

☞ Have you job printing done at the Herald Office,

☞ J. D. Robbins has constantly on hand a large stock of School Books, Paper, Pens, and Ink, His assortment of Watches, Clocks and Jewelry is larger than ever. Call and see.

☞ Life is but a field of blackberry and raspberry bushes. Mean people squat down and pluck the fruit, no matter how they black their fingers; while genious, proud and perpendicular, strides fiercely on, and gets nothing but scratches and horn in his trousers.

☞ The number of postage stamps made by the National Bank Note Company for the year 1865, has been about one million per day. The stamps are printed, perforated, gummed and packed for twelve cents a thousand.

☞ LOST, At or near the Methodist Church, in this village, on Sunday evening last, a plaid woolen shawl. Any person finding the same and leaving it at the store of Anderson & Larned, will be suitably rewarded.

STAMP YOUR RECIPTS.—The neglect to stamp receipts given for money, or goods have become so common that the Revenue Department has sent out orders to have the law enforced against delinquents. The fine is fifty dollars for neglecting to apply the stamp by the party giving the receipt

☞ To prevent the smoking of a lamp soak the wick in strong vinegar and dry it well before you use it; it will then burn clearly and give much satisfaction for the trifling trouble in preparing it.

FEEDING POULTRY IN WINTER.—Hens require in winter, to make them lay eggs, something to form the shell, as lime, old plaster, pounded oyster shell, or even coal ashes will be beneficial to some extent. They are requiring fresh meat two or three times a week, in order to produce the greatest number of eggs, of which they are capable in cold weather. Any refuse meat from the kitchen will do as well as the best. Boiled potatoes, mixed with pepper, and fed warm are excellent food, as a change.

A GOOD HINT TO SOLDIERS.—It is a well known fact that the War Department never gives a copy of a discharge to a soldier who has lost or sold the original document. If you get your discharge recorded in the County Clerk's office, you can at any time obtain a certified copy of it by which you may realise your bounty and land grants. Get your discharges recorded by all means, and immediately. It will save you trouble and expense in case you should be unfortunate enough to loose your discharge.

☞ SULPHUR AND CHOLERA.—Dr. Herring, of Philadelphia, in his "Domestic Physician," says of Asiatic Cholera: "The surest preventative is sulphur: put half a teaspoonful of flour of sulphur into each of your stockings and go about your business; never go out with an empty stomach; eat no fresh bread nor sour food. This is not only a preventative in Cholera, but also in many other epidemic diseases. Many thousands who have followed this advice, have not been attacked by the cholera.

☞ The Executive Committee of Agricultural Society closed its session at Detroit last week, and resolved to hold a general convention of the farmers and all citizens interested in agricultural affairs, at the city of Jackson, on the 21st of February. The Convention will probably be held for three days, commencing on Wednesday, and amongst the prominent subjects that will be discussed are to be wool growing and sheep-breeding and the matters connected with that interest, cattle and stock-growing, and also the general culture of farms as best adapted to the agricultural position of the State.

MORE NEW FIRMS.—Tecumseh, just now, appears to be afflicted with a mania for new firms. Messrs. Gould & Waldo have purchased the establishment formerly occupied by Taylor & Son, and design keeping a stock of Drugs and Groceries. The Millinery Establishment of L. Wilbur has passed into the hands of Wm. H. Waring. Mr. Waring intends to add largely to his stock in the Spring and make a Millinery and Furnishing establishment superior to anything we have ever had here.

Our enterprising Photograph Artist, A. J Hoag has sold out, and is, we understand, about to remove from this place to Toledo, and we wish him the success in his new field of operation, to which he is justly entitled. As an artist it is hard to find his superior. Our citizens will doubtless regret his departure. His succesor Mr. Wm. K. Powers is a young man of energy a perseverance, thoroughly conversant with the business in all its parts, and will fill Mr. Hoags place as well as any other man can. We wish him success in his new establishment.

DRY FEET.—Here is a bit of information worthy of attention: Moisture generally penetrates the soles of boots—the upper leather is not so easily wet and is easily dried. To render the sole impervious to water, order your boot maker to cut canvass in the proper shape, dip them in melted pitch or tar, and lay them upon the inner soled before putting on the outer soles of the boots. This simple process, it is said, will insure dry feet without making the boots clumsy.

UNION LYCEUM.—At a regular meeting of the Lyceum held on Monday evening last and a general election of officers took place for the second official term and the following named persons were duly elected;

President.—O. P. Bills.
Vice President.—E. Norcross.
Recording Secretary.—Miss Nell Beers
Corresponding Secretary.—S. S. Stacy.
Treasurer.—Col. L. Saviers.
Ex. Com. { B. J. Harding. F. M. Bell. Chas. Cook.

The regular weekly debate will be resumed on Monday evening next.

☞ There are some of our subscribers who have never paid us a cent since we commenced publishing the 'Herald.' To those we would say, we must have our money or we shall place the account in an officers hands for collection immediately. A word to the wise is sufficient.

☞ The lecture on Wednesday evening by Hon. E B. Fairfield was rathe slimly attended owing to the inclemency of the weather. The lecture itself however gave the best of satisfaction. President Fairfield is a vigorous writer and a very pleasing speaker. Those who remained away on account of the storm missed a rare treat. The next and last lecture of the course will be delivered on Friday evening of next week by B. F. Taylor of Chicago.

☞ The re-construction of the rebel states and the prospect of war with Mexico, are now the most exciting topics of the times, but the drug Store of Dr. Curtis is also another subject of great interest. A beautiful assortment of Yankee Notions, Pocket Knives, the finest assortment ever brought to this town; also Pocket Books, Beads, Photographs, Photograph Albums, and everything else that anybody can ask for.

☞ Please observe that R. C. Moore has a large lot of sheetings—selling now at lower prices than they are worth in New York;—all cotton goods proportionally low. Moore's is now the place to buy goods.

If you want any Furs—go to Moore's.
If you want Cottons—go, by all means to the leading Dry Good Store of R. C. Moore.

SMALL QUANTITY.—One teaspoonful of that world renowned remedy, Co's Dyspepsia Cure, taken after meals, will enable the most confirmed dyspeptic to eat anything he chooses without fear of any distressing effects. It is a blessing to all who are troubled with diseases pertaining to the stomach and bowels

The proprietors of Coe's Cough Balsam say, take little and often. Doctor the throat and bronchial tubes, not the stomach. This is the secret of its success. It will not harm you to take it often, and every time you take it, you will see its beneficial effects.

Interesting Dialogue.

WHEAT—MEAT—CABBAGE—POTATOES—GRAPES—BEETS—TOMATOES—BREAD—CAKE—AND SOME OTHER THINGS—AND THE BOYS AND GIRLS BESIDES.

SCENE—John Smith's Country Store—TIME, Evening—SPEAKERS, Sundry Villagers, and Farmers who have "happened in as usual."

MR. SMITH.—Trade is very dull nowadays; I don't sell half as much as I did five years ago.

MR. JONES.—Good reason, Things're so high, we can't afford to buy. You charge such awful prices, Smith.

SMITH.—Can't help it. I have to pay so much more. When I sold sugar at 10 cents a pound I made a cent a pound, and I only make a cent now on 20 cents, and this cent profit don't go so far to keep my family.

BROWN.—I buy just as much as ever. I don't see as there is any change. I used to sell my 600 bushels of wheat for 75 cents a bushel, or $450. Of this, $250 went for family store bills, and $200 to pay off my farm debt. Now, when I sell for $1 50 per bushel, or 900, it takes about $600 for store bills, and leaves $400 to pay off the debt.—In fact, these high prices suit me. I wish Mr. McCulloch had kept out of the Treasury, for he threatens to make Greenbacks par, and knock down prices.

PRICE. I don't see as it makes much difference If there is twice as much money going, and everybody gets twice as much for everything he raises, and pays twice as much for everything he buys, it all comes out square at the end; and there is this gain in the operation: those who save money or make a profit, make double, as neighbor Brown explains about his farm debt.

BUTLER.—That's so.

GREENE.—So I think.—MOORE.—So do I.

BAKER.—There is a little drawback. I keep the accounts of Widow Roberts, who has the mortgage on Brown's farm, and the $400 he pays, don't go only half so far in supporting her and educating her children.

TRAVIS (the school Teacher).—Yes it does, for I only get $30 a month for teaching Mrs Robert's and others' children, and I used to get $25, with whert at 75c.

REV. MR COREY.—And I only get $600 a year, while I always had $500 with wheat at 75 cents and sugar 10 cents.

SEVERAL VOICES.—That ain't quite square

KNOX, [Editor.]—And you only pay me $2 a year for my newspaper, which you thought cheap at $1,50, five years ago, though I have now to pay three times as much for every thing I use in making a newspaper.

GREENE.—Why don't you raise your prices too?

KNOX.—People won't stand it I must keep along with no profit, or even at a loss, hoping for better times, or lose my subscribers, and let the paper go down. Why, when I raised the price from $1.50 to $2 a year, a good many stopped the paper—among them Brown himself, though I paid him double for his wheat.

BROWN.—I didn't stop it so much for the price; I went in for paying for my farm by extra economy.

KNOX.—Yes, he followed my advice for people "to economise and pay their debts now." But let us see if Mr. Brown began at the right place. On one Saturday I published in my paper that wheat had advanced 15 cents a bushel. On Monday Brown went to market with his wheat, and sold 60 bushels at one cent advance over the old price, and thought he did well He came home boasting about it, until he met neighbor Johnston, who got the 15 cents advance, because he read my paper, and was wide awake. Brown's loss on 60 bushels would pay four whole years' subscription.

BROWN.—Don't say anything more about that, Knox, and put me down a subscriber for life.

KNOX,—I have heard of several other such losses by those who stopped my paper. Not to be personal, as some of them are here, I will call them A. B C, etc. A paid 4 per cent more fees on $75 taxes, because he did not see the collector's notice in my paper and thus lost $2 84, to save $2. B. paid $3,60 the same way. C failed to bring in his claim against an estate, because he did not see in my paper the legal notice limiting the time. That cost him $34, to save $2 subscription. D. sold 200 pounds of wool at 32 cents, because he did not see an advertisement of Smith, right here at home, offering 70 cents. That cost him $16, to save

2. F's boys went down to the village every night or two, to get the news and local gossip, because they had no paper at home, and one of them fell into bad company, and is ruined. I know twenty cases where people lost money for not learning what is going on. I gather up all that is going on in business and society, and condense it into my columns. It is important for every man to know all about home matters, and I doubt if there is a man in this whole town who would not, in the course of a year, get some information, that would pay him back more than $2 a year And then think of a household sitting down together 365 days in a year, and having nothing to talk about, except their own affairs, and a few items of gossip, gathered up by occasional contact with other people

TAYLOR.—Let me help Editor Knox's argument. Wife read to me an item he published about a humbug, which he copied from the American Agriculturist, of New York City. Next day one of those same humbugs came round with his article, and was so plausible that he almost persuaded her into paying him $3, for his swindling recepe; but the editor's caution kept her back.

KNOX.—Yes, and do you know that the fellow sold more than fifty of the humbug recipes hereabout, at $3 a piece? but not to any one of my subscribers

POTTS.—Put me down as a subscriber, Knox, here is your two dollars.

SHAW.—And me too.

KNOX.—Thank you, gentlemen. I'll try to make a better paper than ever. Every dollar helps: a new subscriber only adds to my expense the cost of paper If everybody took the paper, and thus divided the cost of getting news, setting type, office rent, etc., I could double the value of the paper to each Please talk the matter over with other neighbors and see if it cannot be done.

SEVERAL VOICES.—We will.

SMITH.—And now while you are about it, I want to make up a club for a good New York paper.

BROWN.—We can't afford to take so many papers.

SMITH.—You have just seen that you could not afford to stop your home paper; let us see if it will not pay to join our club. Rich, you have taken the American Agriculturist for several years. Does it pay?

RISH.—Pay? Yes, fifty times over. Why, I got two ten acre fields ready to sow to wheat, and put in one of them. That night my Agriculturist came, and I read a simple recommendation about preparing seed wheat I called John and we put 15 bushels in soak for the next day It cost 50 cents for the materials. Well, that second field yielded 5 bushels an acre more than the other—or 50 bushels extra, and better wheat too. Pretty good pay for $1 50 expended for a paper—And I have got lots of other hints almost as profitable You know I get better profits on my beef, pork and mutton, than any other man in the place. Now does this not come from any direct hint, like the wheat, but from a good many suggestions that I have picked up in reading the Agriculturist, and from the course of reasoning that I have been led into, by reading in it what others do, and think, and say.

SMITH.—You are another subscriber to the Agriculturist. West; does it pay?

WEST.—Pay? Yes. You know what good cabbages and potatoes I had last season—Why, the cabbages were worth double any others in town, for market or for home use. I had 400 heads, worth 5 cents a piece, extra and they only cost 20 cents extra for seed My 250 bushels of potatoes are all engaged for seed at 1,50 a bushel, when other kinds bring only 50 cents That's $250 clear gain, for the $14 extra I paid for seed, and the $1.50 I paid for the Agriculturist. It was through this paper that I learned about both the cabbages and the potatoes. Its editors are careful, intelligent men, on the constant lookout for anything new that is really good, while the paper abounds in cautions against the poor and unprofitable.

SMITH.—What say you, Taylor? Does it pay to invest $1 50 in the 'Agriculturist?'

TAYLOR.—Most certainly. A hint in the paper led me look after certain insects at the proper time, and the result was, I had 160 barrels of splendid apples, which brought me a clean $5 per barrel, and this you know was better by $1, than the average prices here, or $160 Then I have read so much about good and bad Graces, the method of treating them, etc., that I can beat the town in raising grapes profitably My son, William, got a kink in his head about Tomatoes, from something the Editors said, and sent for seed. He made more money on the crop raised in his spare hours, than was cleared by half the farmers in this town.

SMITH.—Let's hear from Crane.

CRANE.—I only read in the paper what was said about hogs—what kind paid best, how to feed them, and the like; but if you will call around and see my porkers, and my expense account, I'll bet a pippin I can show fifty dollars more of pork for the same money, than any other man here. And this comes from reading what other men think and do But Wife ought to be here to speak She and the girls read the "Agriculturist" next to the Bible. They think the household department is worth more than all the fashion magazines in the world. They say it is so full of good hints about all kinds of house work. All I can say is, that we do have better bread and cake; and Wife says, the cake don't cost so much as it used to—She has learned from the paper how a now a hundred other house-keepers do their work.

REV COREY.—Let me say, also, that Mrs. Crane and her daughters have added a good many beautiful but cheap home made fixtures to their parlor and sitting rooms, which certainly make their home more attractive. They told me the other day, they got these up from pictures and descriptions in the "Agriculturist"

TRAVIS.—My salary has not allowed me to take the paper; though I must squeeze out enough to do so this year. My school boys have brought me some copies to look at, the past year or two, and I find the Boys' and Girls' department of the 'Agriculturist" the best thing I ever saw. It is full of items, etc., that amuse and at the same time instruct the children. Why I could pick out the boys and girls in my school whose parents take the "Agriculturist," just by hearing them talk—they are so full of new and good things they have learned from the paper. The paper has many beautiful engravings.

COREY.—As small as is my salary, I would have the paper if it cost $5 a year, instead of $1,50 The fact is, it helps out my salary. My little garden plot at the parsonage has yielded us almost all our table vegetables, besides many beautiful flowers. The "Agriculturist" has been my constant guide. I knew but little of gardening; but this paper is so full of information about the best things to plant and sow, when to plant, and how to cultivate—all told in so plain and practical a way, by men who seem to talk from their own experience, that I know just what to do, and how to do it well The high moral tone of the paper, its common sense, the care it takes of all parts of the Farm, the Garden; the Orchard—the Household work, and the Children as well, with its hundreds of beautiful and instructive engravings—make it the most valuable periodical I have ever seen. I heartily wish every one of my parishoners would take it for himself and family It would awaken thought and enterprise, give interest to the town and neighborhood talk, stimulate improvement, introduce new and profitable crops, animals and implements, and add to our wealth Take my advice, and all of you try the paper a year. The 1,50 it costs, is only three cents each week, and it is worth that any way. Why the large and beautiful engravings are worth many times that.

DAVIS.—I took the Genesee Farmer last year, and as that has stopped, I thought I would take a new paper

SMITH.—The "Genesee Farmer" was not really stopped. The Publishers of the "Agriculturist" invited Mr. Harris to join the Farmer to the "Agriculturist," and put his whole force into the latter paper They paid him a large price for his office, and moved it with everything connected with it to their office. So the "Agriculturist" is really two papers joined into one, and of course better. I think we better go with Harris to the "Agriculturist," that has been published for 25 years, and has a circulation, which, as Knox has told us, supplies the means and facilities for giving us a great deal more for the same money. Harris carries on his large farm and his "Walks and Talks on the Farm," and other things he writes for the "Agriculturist, he tells us a great deal about all kinds of farm work.

DAVIS.—Put me down for the "Agriculturist."

SMITH.—I am glad to do so. I know you will like it. The January number, which has just come to hand, is alone worth the cost of a year. See here, (showing it,) there are 40 pages, twice as large as the magazine pages, and there are thirty-five engravings in it, two of them full page size, and see how beautiful? Why, I'll give any man who takes the papers a year, a dollar and a half in goods out of my store, if he says at the end of a year he has not got his money's worth.

BUTLER.—Put me in your club.

GREENE.—And me too.—BROWN And me.

SMITH.—I have no interest in the matter, except to do a good thing for the place You can join our club, or any one who desires can get the "Agriculturist" for all of 1866 (Volume 25), by simply enclosing $1.50 with his name and post-office address and sending it to ORANGE JUDD & Co. 41 PARK ROW, NEW YORK CITY. The paper always comes regularly, and, what is a good thing, it stops when your time is up without you having to write about it.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK.

Gen. Sheridan disavows any knowledge of the recent capture of Bagdad, and deems the whole report a sensation story. Senor Romero, the Mexican minister at Washington, discredits the report that the French are about evacuating Mexico, and says it is Napoleon's plan to invade Northern Mexico and thus not only crush opposition to Maximilian, but to place an army between the United States and Mexico.

Mrs. Martha Grinder, the female poisoner, was executed at Pittsburgh on the 19th. In the murders of Mrs. Carothers and Miss Buchanan she confessed her guilt, but denied the general charges made against her.

The execution was an awful sight. The wretched woman fell about three feet, owing to an oversight in adjusting the rope connected with the upright under the trap. Her fall was not sudden. The neck was not dislocated, and she slowly strangled to death. Her contortions and writhings for several minutes, were agonizing to the beholders. The knot, too, had slipped, and the circulation of the blood on the right side of the neck was wholly uninterrupted. Her death was literally a hard one.

A dreadful fire occurred at Olean, N. Y., on Tuesday, 16th inst. The whole business portion of the village was destroyed—not a single store is left standing. One man perished in the flames. The loss is estimated at half a million dollars; mostly covered by insurance.

European advices are to January 5th. The Fenian trials at Cork were closed on the 2d, and several prisoners released on bail were cheered through the streets by large crowds. American vessels have suffered great damages by the recect gales. The London Times denounces the present system of consigning to America, on credit, unlimited supplies of goods, with no proportionate return of products. The new Italian ministry has been organized, under the presidency of La Marmora. The Pope fears that on the departure of the French troops the enemies of the church will go to Rome. At his New Year's reception, Louis Napoleon expressed his happiness that the past year had strengthened the bonds of peace for all nations. John Bright made another great reform speech at Rochdale.

Gen. Carl Schurz and others addressed a large meeting at Wilmington, Del., last week on the question of negro suffrage, taking strong grounds in its favor.

The deaths from cholera in Guadaloupe, West Indies, average 131 daily, out of a population of 10,000.

John Sherman is elected Senator from Ohio, by a vote of 24 to 41.

Bills have been introduced in both houses of the Wisconsin Legislature to revive capital punishment, and a strong effort will be made to secure their passage.

In the Tennessee House of Representatives on the 15th, a violent altercation occurred between Messrs. Steel and Arnell, during a discussion of the bill giving civil rights to negroes; and the House adjourned in great confusion.

The New York World's Havana correspondent says Spanish war steamers are ready for sea, if any Chilian pirates, said to be fitting out in New York, should make their appearance.

At a late hour of the night she arose from bed in order to cover her three children more carefully, and again retired with the infant at her breast. Next morning she was found frozen to death with the innocent babe endeavoring to suckle from the breast of its dead mother. Her husband being a night watchman, did not come home until daylight. A plausible fellow called at a drinking saloon in Cincinnati early the other morning, and after a little parleying with the lad in charge, handed him a bottle, uncorked, requesting him to smell of it and pass judgment upon it as a good quality of gin—something new entirely. The lad applied it to his nose, and with energy inhaled the liquid several times. Failing to detect any odor like that of gin he handed the bottle back with a statement to that effect. But as he did this he began to experience a dull feeling of drowsiness—an indescribable idea of nonentity. He, however, retained sense enough, though reeling like one intoxicated to detect the stranger in an attempt to "tap the till," and he fought with him with what strength he had left for the possession of the money in the drawer. Fortunately, a gentleman desiring an early drink happened to enter, when the thief made his escape just as the boy fell insensible to the floor. This is a new mode of using chloroform.

Recollections of the Late Abraham Lincoln.

His Grief for his Dead Willie.

BY F. B. CARPENTER.

William Wallace Lincoln died Thursday, Feb. 20, 1862. After the funeral, the President resumed his official duties, but mechanically, and with a terrible weight at his heart. The following Thursday he gave way to his feelings, and shut himself from all society. The second Thursday it was the same; he would see no one, and seemed a prey to the deepest melancholy. About this time the Rev. Dr. Vinton, of Trinity church, New York, had occasion to spend a few days in Washington. An acquaintance of Mrs. Lincoln and her sister, Mrs. Edwards, of Springfield, he was requested by them to come up and see the President. The setting apart of Thursday for the indulgence of his grief had gone on for several weeks, and Mrs. Lincoln began to be seriously alarmed for the health of her husband, of which fact Dr. Vinton was apprised. Mr. Lincoln received him in the parlor, and an opportunity was soon embraced by the clergyman to chide him for showing so rebellious a disposition to the decrees of Providence. He told him plainly that the indulgence of such feelings, though natural, was sinful. It was unworthy one who believed in the Christian religion. He had duties to the living, greater than those of any other man, as the chosen father, and leader of the people, and he was unfitting himself for his responsibilities by thus giving way to his grief. To mourn the departed as lost belong to heathenism—not Christianity. "Your son," said Dr. Vinton, "is alive, in Paradise. Do you remember that passage in the Gospel: "God is not the God of the dead but of the living, for all live unto him." Mr. Lincoln had listened as one in a stupor, until his ears caught the words, "Your son is alive." Starting from the sofa, he exclaimed, "Alive! alive! Surely you mock me." "No, sir, believe me," replied Dr. Vinton, "it is a most comforting doctrine of the Church, founded upon the words of Christ himself." Mr. Lincoln looked at him a moment, and then, stepping forward, he threw his arm around the clergyman's neck, and, laying his head upon his breast, sobbed aloud. "Alive! alive!" he repeated. "My dear sir," said Dr. Vinton, greatly moved, as he twined his own arm around the weeping father, "believe this, for it is God's most precious truth. Seek not your son among the dead, for he is not there, he lives to-day in Paradise! Think of the full import of the words I have quoted. The Sadducees, when they questioned Jesus, had no other conception than that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were dead and buried. Mark the reply: "Now that the dead are raised even Moses showed at the bush when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. For he is not the God of the dead, but of the living, for all live unto him!" Did not the aged patriarch mourn his sons as dead: "Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and yet you will take Benjamin also." But Joseph and Simeon were both living, though he believed it not. Indeed, Joseph being taken from him, was the ultimate means of the preservation of the whole family. And so God has called your son into his upper kingdom—a kingdom and an existence as real, more real than your own! It may be that he, too, like Joseph, has gone, in God's good providence, to be the salvation of his father's household. It is a part of the Lord's plan for the ultimate happiness of you and yours. Doubt it not. "I have a sermon," continued Dr. Vinton, "upon this subject, which I think might interest you." Mr. Lincoln begged him to send it at an early day—thanking him repeatedly for his cheering and hopeful words. Through a member of the family, I have learned that the sermon was sent, and read over and over by the President, who caused a copy to be made for his own private use, before it was returned. Upon the same authority, I have been informed that Mr. Lincoln's views in relation to spiritual things seemed changed from this hour. Certain it is, that thenceforth he ceased the observance of the day of the week upon which his son died, and gradually resumed his accustomed cheerfulness.

A hunter in Colorado killed six fawns in one day and sold them for a handsome sum. There was "the thrift that follows fawning."

Business Education.

Young men who are thinking of getting a business education, should study well the advantages to be derived from the institution that they select for that purpose. This department of education is very popular at the present time, and, as a matter of course, mushroom institutions are springing up to take advantage of the popularity that has been given it by others that have put forth every effort and spared no expense to do their duty to their patrons, for twelve years past. We may mention the International Chain of Business Colleges, under the direction of Messrs. Bryant, Stratton & Co., as the great leaders and workers in this department. By their indomitable energy and enterprise, they have established a chain of forty-six colleges, located in the principal cities of the United States and the Canadas. They have also prepared a standard series of text books, which are universally acknowledged to be the best works of the kind published. This Chain of Colleges have a more extended course of actual business training than any single college can possibly have. There are more students attending Bryant, Stratton & Co.'s Chain of Colleges than all others put together. A life scholarship in this Chain is good to the holder in any of them for an unlimited time. The Chicago College of this Chain has grown to immense proportions, now occupying three large business blocks in the centre of the city. A young man who is posted as to the advantages of this Chain of Colleges, cannot be at a loss to know where he had better take a scholarship.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Scientific American says that a common brass clock may be cleaned by immersing the works in boiling water. "Rough as this treatment may appear," he says, "it works well; and I have, for many years past, boiled my clocks whenever they stopped from the accumulation or a thickening of oil upon the pivots. They should be boiled in pure rain water, and dried on a warm stove or near the fire."

ROMANCE.

BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

Oh! she was a maid of laughing eye,
And she lived in a garret cold and high,
And he was a threadbare, whiskered beau,
And he lived in a cellar damp and low.

But the rosy boy of the cherub wing,
Hath many a shaft for his slender string
And the youth below and the maid above
Were touched with the flashing darts of love.

And she would wake from her troubled sleep,
O'er his tender billet-doux to weep;
Or stand like a statue cold and fair,
And gaze on a lock of his bright red hair.

And he who was so tall and proud,
With his step so firm and laugh so loud,
His beard grew long and his face grow thin,
And he pined in solitude over his gin.

But one soft night in the month of June,
As she lay in the light of a cloudless moon,
A voice came floating soft and clear
To the startled maiden's listening ear.

Oh, then from her creaking couch she sprung,
And her tangled tresses back she flung;
She looked from the window far below,
And he stood beneath—her whiskered beau!

She did not start with a foolish frown,
But packed up her truck and scamper'd down;
And there was her lover, tall and true,
In his threadbare coat of the brightest blue.

The star that rose in the evening shade,
Looked sadly down on a weeping maid;
The sun that came in the morning pride
Shed golden light o'er a laughing bride.

Uncle Jacob's Wife.

We were sitting round the breakfast table, my father, mother, brother Tom, two sisters, and myself, one winter's morning, when the letters came in, nearly an hour late, for, contrary to the custom of many country places, we had an eight-o'clock delivery.

"Postman says, sir, that the roads are frozen so slippery that he had to leave his horse at a farm-house, and walk over with the bag," said James apologetically, as he laid the letters by my father's plate.

"There's always something wrong," said my father with a shrug, "when I am expecting important letters."

"Give the man a glass of beer," said my mother, as James left the room.

The girls smiled to each other at the lofty sound, "important letters," though, to be sure, the prices of oats, wheat-straw, and potatoes were very important matters in our father's eyes. We, however, cared little whether sheep ruled at heavy rates, pigs were lively, or turnips dull, for it did not seem to make much matter to us whether the markets were up or down, my father never making money in either case. It is not wonderful, therefore, that we should have lost our interest in farming details.

My mother used to take these little misfortunes very quietly. "Your father will never make his fortune, my dears," she would say with as pleasant a face as possible. "He isn't the man to do it, even by accident; but as long as he gets enough out of the farm to let us live comfortably and want for nothing, I think we ought to be content; and then, you know, there is Uncle Jacob to fall back on."

"If my father would just pitch that scientific nonsense of his on one side he would soon make the farm pay; I wish chemistry had never been invented," was Tom's irreverent opinion; and as far as regards my father's application of science to the working of our farm, Tom was practically right. My mother supported my father's views with all her might, but as Tom said: "My mother would be ready to see snow in August, if my father saw it." And this was as it should be, and she and my father had the dull comfort of their unanimity.

"Tom, my dear," said my mother one day, when he was trying to persuade her to give her voice against one of his father's newest notions. "I would not oppose your father's opinion for almost any consideration. We should save twenty pounds, you think, on the five-acre field, if we were to—"

"Yes, certainly; quite twenty pounds," interrupted Tom.

"But your father would not be pleased, and I would pay twenty pounds any day (if I had it), rather than have him vexed."

"The day will come, mother, when you won't be able to afford it; it's quick work going down-hill. One comfort is, however, if the worst comes [to the worst, we have Uncle Jacob to fall back on some day."

But we have wandered from the breakfast-table. My father glanced through a couple of letters, which did not seem to please him much.

"Read that from Jacob," said my mother, pointed to one.

"How do you know it's from Jacob?" asked my father, always a little jealous if he thought his letters were in any way scrutinized, even to the reading of a post-mark.

"I see his writing across the table," said my mother meekly. Here she touched another weak spot of my father's; he was the slightest bit envious of her better sight.

"I will wait," he said, and chipped at his egg. But the touch of spleen was but momentary, and he presently broke Uncle Jacob's red seal.

"He is coming here," he said, without looking up.

"He will be welcome," said my mother, and my father read on. He always read straight through a letter before enlightening us. Suddenly his face changed. He turned pale, absolutely white, he whose complexion was like that of one of his own ruddy apples; his hand shook, too, and he threw down the letter.

"What is it? Is he dead?" asked my mother in her fright, forgetting that she was looking at his writing.

"Worse than dead!" said my father.

"What has he done?" we three girls exclaimed in a breath. "Is it very bad?" for my father's face was a picture.

"Pshaw!" said my father, and his color came back as he spoke, "he's going to be married."

"Married!"

"Married!"

"Married!" We all pronounced the dreadful word, and then there was silence, and we thought much and said little. The matter, in fact, was beyond speech.

"There go your fortunes, girls!" said Tom, breaking silence, with a look that reminded me of his old mischievous school-boy days.

"Hold your tongue, sir!" thundered my father.

"I must say I think it inconsiderate of Jacob, highly inconsiderate," said my mother, but something in her voice pleaded for Uncle Jacob as she spoke; she was such an unreasoning sort of woman, my mother, in her voice pleaded for Uncle Jacob as she spoke; she was such an unreasoning sort of woman, my mother, in her habit of leaning to mercy's side.

"Inconsiderate! Disgraceful!" said my father.

"Yes, my dear Charles, very disgraceful," said my mother; but I caught the same tone of appeal in her voice.

"Shameful! Ridiculous! Unheard of!" My father was given to the piling of epithets. "Pitiable in a man of his age?"

"He is old to marry," said my mother.

"Old. Only think of it. I am sixty-seven, and he is not two years younger."

"I suppose he was very lonely."

"Why could he not have come here, then?"

"His business, my dear," said my mother. "I suppose he cannot leave his his office in town for long."

"Why not have asked one of the girls to go and live with him if he was lonely? Lonely! nonsense! The man has no more feeling of loneliness or anything else than a dried stick. Lonely!"

"It seems a pity," said the gentle voice of the gentlest of all gentlewomen.

"You don't appreciate the case at all, Mary! The old goose! So, nothing but marrying will serve his turn—and all out of spite too! Well, he is bringing a fine lot of cares on his shoulders, and so he'll find. There's an end to his quiet life now. The trouble of a wife—" Here my father checked himself, seeing, perhaps something in my mother's face.

'No Mary' I didn't mean that! You know I did not. You and I have pulled together without a rub for thirty-five years. Why Polly, what are you thinking of?" She did not speak, but I always thought my mother's smile was better by far than words. My father thought so too. Her smile was known to all of us to be the sunlight under which the sour part of his nature ripened to sweet.

"I wonder what she is like?" queried Tom, unluckily giving utterance to the thought that was seething in our girlish minds.

"Stuff, sir! What does it matter?" said my father effervescing again. "A designing woman, no doubt. Designing women are all alike."

"She must be uncommonly sharp," said Tom.

The moment my father left the table, our pent-up feelings had full play, and we relieved ourselves by much conversation, my mother acting as moderator.

"I think your uncle had a right to please himself," said my mother, as she left the room to attend to her household duties. Perhaps he had. People are not to be deprived of their rights because they are old and rich, and have a circle of nephews and nieces expectant of solid remembrances in his will. No, certainly not; but still it cannot be denied that this news fell hardly upon us; we had made so sure you see. But I have not described Uncle Jacob. This is easily done, though, there being very little of him to describe. He was a little man, not over five feet six, certainly, with a little, neat, long figure, surmounted by rather a long head. Uncle Jacob was a long-headed man in every sense of the word. His features were hard and small. I mean they looked physically hard—wooden, for the expression of his face was good. His hands were small and hard, too; in fact the second finger of his right hand, where the pen leans, seemed turned to the very bone. He was my father's only brother, and had been sent out early in life, with fifteen hundred pounds in his pockets, to make his own way in the world, while my father as the eldest brother, had inherited the freehold farm we live on.

With my father, time had stood still, so speak. He was no richer and no poorer now at the age of sixty-seven than he had been forty years before; but with my uncle things had been different. He might sit down at the ink-stained desk in the little, mouldy office in Mincing Lane, and take his hard pen in his hard, small fingers, and write his hard name in the crabbedest of hands, and the checque he wrote on would be worth three hundred and twenty thousand pounds. So Mr. Sneck, his clerk would say with a triumphant look to his familiars. As for Uncle Jacob, he never spoke about the state of his affairs; his mind was tight and trim and self-contained like himself.

Now, Uncle Jacob never spoke of leaving us sixpence, but we built our hope on the circumstances of the case, and very reasonably too, I think. He had not a single relation in the world outside of our house. He had always been kind to us in his way, paying Tom's school bills, and sending my mother presents of the quaintest ornaments that could well be seen. He was really very fond of her in his undemonstrative way, and had told my father confidentially several times that she was an "excellent woman." On one occasion, too, my father had been lamenting in his presence that we girls could have no fortunes.

"Tom must have the farm of course; and then if he marries," my father had said. And Uncle Jacob had said "Don't fret yourself about their fortunes."

There was no promise in the words, certainly—that is no promise expressed—but did not an implied one lurk there so slightly hidden as too be seen? We thought so, and rejoiced and made merry over it, and felt sure of our fortunes from that time forward.

"I wonder if he will ask us to the wedding?" said Nettie, the youngest and liveliest of us all, as we sat together over the fire in the workroom.

"He may spare himself the trouble" said Jane.

"In any case it would not be wise to offend him," said I.

"It doesn't signify whether he is offended or not," said Jane with a toss. "His wife will take care of him now."

"I should dearly like to be asked." said Nettie.

"Why?"

"Why, Kate, it would be such rare fun."

"Fun?" said I. I do believe you think of nothing but fun, Nettie, and after all, it will be very poor fun for us, this marriage."

"He will look so odd! Think of the little wee man in his green coat, with his shining bald head, with his bridegroom's white gloves on, and a rose in his button-hole, putting a ring on her finger (he must have his spectacles on to do it properly,) and saying all those things he will have to say. O, how romantic he will look! How can she ever find it in her heart to marry him?" And Nettie broke into one of her merry peals of laughter "Such an old fright! How can she?"

"She sees him through a golden mist," Jane said.

"I should so dearly like to see it—the wedding."

"If you go, you may go by yourself," said Jane. "I do think you are like a child in some things yet, Nettie and yet you are twenty-two."

"I shall never forget that fact, dear, you remind me so often; but when I think of your age, I fell quite like a child; thirty-five sounds quite important after my two-and-twenty. No Jane, never mind, I'm sorry I said it; it was spiteful of me. Don't be vexed this time, and I'll never say a word about your age again." And Nettie put her mouth in such a pleading shape that Jane could not have been angry if she had tried. A learned prelate tells us in an erratic offspring of his genius, that a little nez retrousse has had power before this to reverse the destinies of an empire. I wonder what his verdict on Nettie's mouth would have been. I know that she ruled us like a little queen—my father included; and I think her power was in her mouth. There was silence for a while, and our needles sped fast.

"I wonder if she is young or old?" Nettie broke out.

"Young of course," said Jane. "Silly old men are always taken in by girls young enough to be their grand daughters. Do you suppose he is going to marry any old woman?"

"Of course she's young," I said,

"I shouldn't have though he would have noticed one way or the other," said Nettie laughing.

"Hush!" said Jane; "here's father coming."

"Nettie," said my father entering, "come into my writing room; I want you to copy me some letters; I am going out."

"Very well," said Nettie; "only mind papa dear, you are not to be cross if I make mistakes. That is to be your part of the bargain. Now come and show me."

Before a week passed, my father had another letter from Uncle Jacob, naming the wedding day, but not asking any of us to be present.

"Although he invites himself here in the coolest manner possible the fortnight after" said my father.

"I would fill the house, sir; ask the Dickinsons and young Clive here, and tell him there wasn't room," was Tom's sapient rejoinder.

"And make his wife an enemy for life," said Jane.

My father shortly enjoined Tom to keep his ideas to himself—so he had evidently decided to receive his visit.

The next question mooted was whether Uncle Jacob would expect wedding presents to be sent by his only relations. After much argument it was decided that he would do so; so we girls set to work at once. I worked a most elaborate handkerchief for the future Mrs. Jacob, and enclosed it in the most perfect of satchels. Tom rode into Worcester, and bought a case of prettily cut and topped scent bottles—a gem of its kind, for her toilet; into which piece of complaisance, however, it took us a whole morning's work to persuade him. Jane shone conspicuous in the manufacture of a work-bag; but Nettie, naughty Nettie set to work upon the manufacture of a most striking waistcoat for Uncle Jacob himself. In vain we pleaded that he never could be induced to commit himself to the wearing of so very ornamental an article.

"He shall wear it," she said. "He ought to be gay on his wedding day. This will brighten him up from a dingy old moth to a butterfly. He won't know himself." My father saw her at her work, and asked her who it was for.

"Uncle Jacob," said Nettie boldly; and when my father looked amazed, she fairly laughed in his face. "He will look very nice in it." My father was not equal to the occasion, and turned away. As to commanding or exhorting Nellie when she was minded to go her own way, he would just as soon thought of using his loaded stick to flip a butterfly off one of his roses. Nettie knew this, and when we threatened her, she would laugh and say, "No, he won't! He won't say a word; he'll lift his eyebrows at me—so—and that's all."

What my father's present to Uncle Jacob was, we never knew, as he has been grimly silent from that day to this.

The wedding day passed, and the fortnight's honeymoon passed, and the bridegroom would be with us next day, (roads permitting. It was really pleasant to have them with us so soon, for our curiosity had been wrought up to the highest pitch—and as yet had nothing to allay it—not a single particular as to the young lady's age, looks, manners, accomplishments, nay, nor even her name. My mother thought of writing to Uncle Jacob, and asking him a few questions about these matters, "to show just a little kindly interest," she said, but she had not done it, my father having looked things unutterable at the bare idea.

My mother in her motherly heart, began to pity the bride, when the hour came for the carringe to be heard crunching the frost up the drive.

"She is sure to be nervous, poor thing. Mind you meet her kindly, girls. It is not her fault about the fortune. I dare say she knows nothing about it."

During one of my mother's pauses came sounds of wheels, and we went in a body to the hall—all of us except my father who kept out of the way, wishing to meet the happy pair privately. Nearer and nearer came the carriage wheels, and we opened the hall door, and stood just inside in the biting cold air, as the green carriage, yellow postboy, and bay horses came up to the steps. She was tall—the bride—inches taller than Uncle Jacob, tall and slight, and dressed in rich, dark clothes, but with so thick a veil down that we could not even make a guess at her face, not even when she kissed us, for she only raised her veil and let it down again. She was timid, no doubt, as my mother had said.

"Come in, dear aunt, by the fire."

"You must both be half frozen."

"You are an hour later than we hoped you would be."

"Dear Uncle Jacob, let Tom take your coat."

Civil things we said of that sort, and finally marshalled our dear relatives to the fireside in the morning-room.

"Stir up the fire well in Mrs. Jacob's bedroom before she goes up stairs," said my mother to the maid when she left the room, "and take up the spiced negus when I ring. It is a great preservative from cold, negus as we make it, said my mother turning to my aunt in an explanatory manner.

"Thank you," said the veiled lady. Uncle Jacob had taken the poker in hand, and was "mending the fire," as he termed it, to such purpose that his yellow-brown face became suffused with an ardent crimson, with and we kept moving our chairs backward half a foot at a time.

"Yes," he said, replying to my mother, "it was (poke), "it was cold" (poke). "The roads were" (scrape of the lower bar) "like glass" (crash of the upper crust) "and we crept along slowly."

"Will she never lift her veil?" pondered I, and caught myself wandering off into musings about the mythical "Pig-faced Lady," and her rich veil never drawn aside fon human eyes to gaze behind. What if my uncle had been tempted by visions of enormous wealth to marry a—what. Before I had decided as to the sort of ugliness, my aunt raised her veil, and I came back to every-day life.

She raised her veil and we all looked at her. Nettie made some excuse and fled from the room, but I could hear her laughing at the other end of the hall.

I think even my mother was startled by the swarthy, gaunt face revealed. It was a Scotch face evidently, for the salient points of Scotch physiognomy were almost caricatured, they were so strongly pronounced. The high cheek-bones might have belonged to a Tartar.

"Are you warm enough to go up stairs?" my mother asked her, with a tremor of surprise in her gentler tones.

"You must speak out to her," said Uncle Jacob, with a curious quiver in the corner of his mouth.

"Out?" my mother asked.

"Yes, loud;" and again the quiver.

"Janet!" and he moved closer to his wife, "Mary wants to know if you are ready to go up stairs?" He spoke in his loudest tones.

"What?" she said, turning an ear as deaf as Dame Eleanor Spearin's. "Up stairs?"

"Yes. Will you go and take your things off?"

"Yes, I am ready, quite ready, thank you;" and she turned to my mother, and rose from her seat.

"Ring for the negus," my mother bade me.—"Janet, let me carry your cloak," she said in a desperate voice; but Aunt Janet was evidently dubious of her meaning till my mother had taken possession of that article.

"Uncle," said Tom, "I'll show you your dressing-room."

"What on earth can he have done it for?" whispered Tom as he passed me.

Jane and I were left together, and Nettie came back when she heard them pass up stairs.

"O Nettie, why did you laugh in the hall?" I asked.

"She wouldn't hear it," said Nettie; "and you know Uncle Jacob's always a little deaf."

"You will be getting us into a scrape, indeed, if you don't take care."

"Not I. O, what a bride!"

"She is an old-looking creature," said Jane.

"Fifty at least."

"We shall be as hoarse as rooks with shouting to her, if they stay for a week," said Jane.

"What a sight the courtship must have been! Poor Uncle Jacob must have made love under difficulties indeed; the whole neighborhood must have been as wise as himself. How ever could he have managed it!" and Nettie burst into a fit of uncontrollable laughter, in which we both joined. In the height of our merriment, Aunt Janet entered the room. It was well she was so deaf, or she might have heard what would have vexed her.

James and the parlor-maid waited on us at dinner in a state of much amazement. Their eyes seemed to be fascinated to her, however much they might try to look the other way. James was quite nervous, too, poor man, and absolutely jumped every now and then when my father roared out a piece of politeness to the lady by his side; but he did his best. He did not attempt to shout to her, for he was so proper-minded a footman, that he would have died rather than lift his voice and bellow in the unseemly manner required; so he employed dumb-show,—lifting up her wine-glass to her notice first, and then holding sherry and Sauterne before her in a beseeching manner, that she might elect between them. Nettie watched him gravely, but unluckily her eyes caught mine, and a spasm of silent laughter passed over her face. She did not laugh, however, and her potato did not choke her, so all was well. The evil moment was only deferred, however, for Aunt Janet bethought herself of the bag that hung by her side, and drawing thence a tube with bone, ear, and mouth pieces fitted thereto, she said to my mother, "Please, use my tube, and I shall hear you;" and uncoiled it as she spoke.

"Take that end to your mistress," said my father to James; but never did tyro taking electric wire in hand look more uncomfortable than did James as he handled the unknown instrument. He seemed to expect a shock as he half-dropped it by my mother's plate.

"Gently!" said Aunt Janet, who had the other end in her ear, and James started worse than ever. No help for it; Nettie must laugh; but with great skill she succeeded in producing a violent fit of coughing that made the tears run down her cheeks.

My father explained the cause of my uncle's marriage to us in the evening after our guests had retired.

"She was Samuel Marten's only child," he began.

"His partner's?" said my mother.

"Yes. When he told me that much, I saw daylight at once. Old Marten died in India over a year ago, and she came home."

"That makes her so brown," said Nettie. "I thought she had an Indian sort of look."

"Her fortune, of course, is very large; and not knowing into what hands she might fall, he thought it would be well to marry her; and she as a woman of sense, saw the wisdom of the step. Jacob has acted a very sensible part; so now all that remains is for us to be civil to her; she deserves it."

"Did he say anything about her deafness, papa?"

"No, child. Why should he?"

"Did you?"

"Nonsense! What does it signify? He'll only lead the quieter life for it. A wife's tongue—Now, Mary," said he, looking at my mother,—"now, Mary, you know what I mean."

"I was not saying anything, dear," said my mother; she led my father in a chain of silk, that was as strong as iron. What a wonder it is that women should ever be ignorant as to where lies the secret of their strength. How few men can resist the might of gentleness! My mother's gentle craft was partly natural, partly won loyally from the Holy Book that teaches so fully of the "soft answer" that is stronger than triple shield against the thrust of wrath.

After a day or two, Aunt Janet took up the habit of coming to the morning-room directly after breakfast, and spending the whole forenoon there. At first, we were rather a silent party after she appeared. No matter how deaf your companion is, it is generally some time before you can cast off the mistaken idea that half of what you say is heard; and Aunt Janet had such a sharp sort of look about her—unlike the patient, waiting look that deaf people usually acquire—that we were absurdly silent in her presence for a while.

Nettie broke the ice first, and made some remarks as to Aunt Janet's personal appearance; but when I started, and looked at the poor lady's face, it was evident that all sounds fell idly alike on those dead ears of hers. "Do you know I like her?" said Nettie abruptly one morning, when my mother was urging us to be more attentive. "Of course, she's the greatest old fright that ever was seen; but she is kindly and good-hearted, I am sure."

My mother looked pained; "Nettie, don't speak of your aunt so. Never mind her looks: she cannot help them."

"I suppose she cannot, mamma, and yet a sort of instinct makes me blame people for being ugly."

"It isn't her face I mind," said Jane, who had taken a strong dislike to our aunt; "but her voice is dreadful. Her voice is like the tearing of calico, and sets my very teeth on edge." Our aunt was sitting knitting quietly by the fire all this time.

"She cannot help her voice," said my mother: "you should try and look at people's pleasant side, Jane."

"I don't think she has a pleasant side."

My mother made no answer, but turned and shouted a little of the morning news from the paper, to amuse our aunt. Presently Tom entered.

"Nettie, look here; there is a great hole in my pocket. Will you sew it up for me?"

"Yes; only come closer. Now, stand still,—do stand still, Tom, dear,—I am pricking my finger."

"How long is she going to stay?" asked Tom.

"As long as she pleases, my mother replied.

"How on earth do you manage to amuse such a living statue? I would not be one of you girls shut up in a room with her morning after morning, for something. She would mesmerize me."

"You pain me, Tom, when you speak so. There is nothing attractive about your aunt; but I am sure she is a very worthy person, and deserving of your respect," said my mother.

"What! for hooking the old gentleman?"

"Tom," said Nettie, "do you think that is Aunt Janet's hair, or a wig?" (in a confidential tone.)

"A wig, to be sure," said Tom, determinedly.

"I cannot bear it, Tom," said my mother; "you must really go out of the room.—Come, Nettie, and show your aunt some of your water-colors. I dare say she likes looking at drawings."

"She looks like a judge," said sarcastic Jane.

Nettie went to the piano after a while, and sang a ballad or two of Balfe's and Lindley's, sliding out of them into some Scotch airs, which she sang uncommonly well. I was watching Aunt Jane's uninterested face as Nettie sang, and thinking, with some pity, how great a privation hers was, when Nettie struck the first bar of Ye Banks and Braes, and a change swept across the immobile face for an instant, as if she heard,—at least, I mean that for a second I fancied so, for as I looked, the face was dull-deaf as ever.

"Poor thing!" said my mother, "how I wish she could hear those sweet Scotch airs!"

"I should not think it would make much difference to her," said Jane. "I don't suppose she is inclined to be romantic."

Two or three days afterwards, my father came into the morning-room just before lunch, and seeing Aunt Janet, was about to withdraw. "I wanted to tell you—" he said to my mother.

"Tell me what, dear?"

"Nothing—but that Jacob told me they are going on Thursday. He is getting fidgetty at being away from the office so long."

"Janet spoke about going to me this morning."

"Well, I hope you have kept her amused. She must be conciliated at any cost. We must have them again soon, though I hate the sight of her. I really cannot enjoy my dinner in the least, shouting out as I must between every mouthful. But it cannot be helped."

"I like her," said my mother; "she is quiet and sensible," as my father moved back out of the door-way.

Thursday morning came, and our guests were to leave us. Uncle Jacob was particularly kind in his manner to us all, telling Nettie and me that we must come and pay our aunt a visit in town after they moved into their new house in Hyde Park Gardens.

"You shall see all that is to be seen, as your aunt means to keep a carriage," he said kindly, and we thanked him as in duty bound; but I don't think we either of us felt inclined to venture on our new aunt's hospitality.

We all went up stairs with Aunt Janet, to help her to dress herself in her wraps and furs. When she was dressed, she sent the maid out of the room, observing to my mother as she did so, that she never gave visitor's money to servants.

"Nor to anybody she can help," said Jane.

"There, you mistake me," said our aunt, turning round sharply on the unlucky Jane in an instant. "I act from principle in not giving to servants, not from greed."

"How ever did she hear me?" gasped Jane in a lower tone to me.

"As I hear other people," said my aunt quietly.—"Good by, dear Mary," (and she turned to kiss my mother). "You have been very kind to me. I never expected you to think me a beauty, you know; you gave me credit for being 'kind-hearted and sensible,'—I think that was it,—and that is all I want from you. Believe me, I think all the better of you for having lived with you for three weeks in the palace of Truth."

"Why, Janet! then you're not deaf after all?"

But what she answered, or what my mother said after that, I don't know, for we beat a hasty retreat from the room. We could not even bring ourselves to go down, and say good-by when we heard my father and Tom shouting the words at the carriage-door. I do not think we broke silence for some minutes, till Nettie said: "We have done it now! How she must hate us!"

"For what?" asked Tom, suddenly appearing; and then we told him all.

"You don't mean it!" and then he gave vent to his feelings in the longest of whistles.

What my father said on the subject we never knew, nor, indeed, guessed, for his face was a sealed book, when he so pleased it, but no doubt his heart condemned him sufficiently.

"It was the meanest trick!" said Jane. "Impossible to defend ourselves against such low cunning."

"No, my dear, you might easily have been safe. I don't think it was quite fair of your aunt, though, and I shall write and tell her so."

A few days brought Aunt Janet's better. "You must forgive me, Mary," she said. "I allow I was wrong.—very wrong, if you will; but when you understand all, you will allow that my temptation was strong to see you all as you are. Some day I will tell you the story of my father's second wife, who happily died before him, and you will see that my dread of designing people is a natural one, after what I have suffered. Come up to town and see me, Mary, and let us talk it all over till you forgive me."

"You have saved us, mother, I do believe," said Tom. "She likes you well enough to smile on us all for your sake."

A letter came from Uncle Jacob next. "Bring the girls with you when you come, Mary," he said. "Don't let them be vexed with their aunt for her whimsies,—she has taken a fancy to your Nettie."

"Nettie's naughtiness serves her as well as most people's goodness," said Tom. "Mother, look at your letter again, and see if there isn't an invitation for me."

The Sorrows of a Lecturer.

For the benefit of a certain class of ambitious men who aspire to become popular lecturers, I send you a few items of my experience. I went to Southern Illinois to get started as a lecturer. I told my hotel keeper that this was my first effort in the lecture line. That I did not care for money if I could only get started. I was unfortunate on that occasion both in my subject and my audience. My subject was "The urgent necessity for an immediate revival and thorough reorganization of the Know Nothing party." My audience were all Irish. I got started.

Being advertised by the nom de plume of "The fat contributer," my audience is sometimes disappointed in the size of the lecturer. Such was the case in a town I visited in Minnesota last summer. My audience was small, owing to the public being suddenly and seriously indisposed—they were indisposed to come to the lecture. My audience, in fact, consisted of but one people. He was a gentleman. I began my discourse "Gentlemen and Ladies," but changed quickly to "Respected Sir!" Before I could proceed any further, the audience rose indignantly to its feet as one man.

I inquired the cause of the interruption.

"Sir," he said; "the audience is disappointed in the size of the lecturer."

"Well, my dear sir," said I, "the lecturer is disappointed in the size of the audience, and if you will not say anything about size, I won't."

He allowed me to proceed, and at the conclusion, was so well pleased that he urged me to stay another night, when he promised me a much larger audience. He could not come himself, but he would send his wife, who weighed two hundred and sixty five pounds. I didn't stay.

I have had a good deal of money in my houses at one time and another—generally in the pockets of some wealthy man in the audience. I always come home with money however. I borrow some to come home with.

I have had some large houses. The largest house I ever had was in Louisville, Ky. That house must have been two hundred feet long, ninety feet wide, while in height it came pretty high—took all the receipts to pay rent. A Louisville editor said a good thing about me. He said: "The 'Fat Contributor' lectured last night to a small house. His style resembles Artemus Ward's but he has not the ease and grace of Artemus before an audience." As though a lecturer could be at ease before an audience that would not pay expenses. As grace accompanies meat, and there wasn't profit enough in the house to buy meat, where's your grace?

He said in continuance that I would improve with practice, provided I had capital enough to continue the practice. And this in the face of the acknowledged fact that I had a capital lecture.

The fullest house I ever had was at Pithole City in the Oil Regions. Every man who came was full of beer. The lecture went off well, notwithstanding. It didn't go off as well as my doorkeeper did. He went of with the receipts.

I gave two consecutive lectures at Oil City. At the conclusion of the second lecture, one of the first citizens (the second citizen had not yet arrived) rose and assured me that I had delighted him greatly. He said that they hadn't enjoyed themselves so well since the Thayers were hung. He added that it was the request of the audience en masse altogether, that I should stay another night. The landlord of the hotel where I was stopping, arose somewhat hastily, and stated that I couldn't stay another night with him unless my bill was secured. Such is sometimes the encouragement that genius receives at the hands of the mercenary.

A little town on the Alleghany turned out well. The principal occupation of the inhabitants was to haul oil. That being the only hall they had, I lectured in a grocery. The people turned out in the most unexpected manner; they turned out the lights—then they turned out the lecturer—because he wasn't fat enough. They gave me twenty minutes to leave town. I told them if they would make it twenty dollars, I'd go.

At the termination of the twenty minutes I felt something come against me very rapidly from behind. My first impression was that it was an old fashioned leather valise. Subsequent reflection has convinced me that it was a boot. I shook hands with them all with much feeling. I told them they must excuse me for I had got to go! Leaving somewhat hastily, I caught the sound of cherub voices in that grocery, singing in tones of the most pathetic inquiry,

"Shall we never more behold thee,
Never hear thy winning voice again?

I yelled back that they wouldn't not if I could help it. "That winning voice," didn't seem to win in that neighborhood.

A friend advised me to go twice to the same place. He said that although I might only make expenses the first time, the next time it would be different. It was to be sure. I only paid expenses the first time, yet the second time—I didn't. I have tried my agents. They proved unsatisfactory with one exception. He never asked me for money. He never alluded to money but once. Said he to me one day:

"You don't care for money, do you?"

"No indeed!" said I.

"I thought not," said he. "I never saw you have a cent."

I humor him in those harmless, light flights of wit. You may hear from me again.

PERSONAL.

M. D. CONWAY in his last letter from London to the Round Table, says: "I saw Dickens the other day. Time is beginning to tell on him. The crows have left plentifully their tracks upon his brow; he always wears an anxious look.

MRS. U. S. SENATOR DIXON of Hartford, Conn., has received a $300 silver pitcher from a few Connecticut men as an evidence of grateful appreciation of her labors in the soldiers' hospital during the war.

REV. E. H. BALDWIN, one of the most famous and eloquent Methodist divines in Alabama, died on the 9th inst. at Solma.

THE Citizen says that Bayard Taylor who is spending the winter in New York, gives the most delicious chit-chat parties over lemons, wine and tea and cakes every Sunday evening.

THE Rev. W. H. Milburn, known as the "blind preacher," has withdrawn from the Methodist church, and was ordained by Bishop Hopkins as a deacon in the Episcopal church.

NELSON J. TOURNEY of Circleville, ex-President of the Ohio State Agricultural society, has lost over fifty fine hogs by cholera, and the disease still continues.

OLE BULL and his fiddle are on another musical tour.

THE Natchez Courier thinks that if Governor Brownlow were to die and go to the deuce, he would assert his right to the crown, and the devil would be merely Lieut. Governor of the concern.

SENATOR CALL of Florida is too young to take his seat. He is a nephew of the late Gov. Call of that state, and a man of much prominence.

SOME people write very illegibly. Hon. Judge Kittridge of Canada, N. H., who on being shown one of his own letters and being asked is he could read it, answered by asking, "What d——d fool wrote that?"

THE Chief Justice of Ireland (Lefoy) is ninety years of age, yet still clings to his high office, though quite incapacitated for performing its duties. In his case is the old proverb realized: "Few die and none resign."

GHAS. E. CALDWELL, literary editor of Moore's Rural New Yorker, died at Rochester December 31st.

M DE LAMARTINE receives forty thousand francs for the life of Byron.

ALEXANDER DUMAS, the elder, is certainly one of the men of our day who most love money and most despise it. One day, ten years ago, he said that he had made $700,000 by his pen, and had not $12 in his pocket. Since then he has probably earned $200,000 more, but it is not believed that he has a cent more in his pocket.

QUEEN VICTORIA when at home, regularly teaches a Sunday school and bible class for the benefit of those residing in the palace and vicinity.

DR. KINKAID of the American Baptist Missionary society, after a residence of thirty-five years in India, is compelled to leave his field of labor, and is on his way to this country.

IN Washington, on the 13th, a box was left at the door of Senator Sumner's private room, addressed to him, and containing a finger cut from the hand of a negro, which was wrapped in a note calling the Senator an obscene name, stating that the writer sends him a piece of one of his friends, and declaring "If that bill of yours passes I will have a piece of you."

Miss Harriet Lane, who presided over the White House during the administration of her uncle, President Buchanan, was married, on the 10th, at Wheatland, Pa., to Mr. Henry E Johnston, a Baltimore banker.

SIR CHARLES LOCK EASTLAKE, the Nestor of English painters, died recently in his 73d year. Under the guidance of Fuseli his genius was developed at an early age, and was revealed to the world in his "Christ at Jerusalem," and other remarkable pictures. He travelled over all the classical regions of Europe, and lived some time at Rome, where he painted many pictures illustrative of Italian life. Among his first paintings is that of the first Napoleon on board the English man-of-war bound for St. Helena. His most celebrated imaginative production is illustrative of a passage of Lord Byron's "Dream." He was knighted and made President of the Royal Academy in 1850, and in 1855 Director of the National Gallery, with a salary of £1,000. He wrote copiously on artistic subjects, and translated Goethe's "Theory of Colors" into English. His wife was Miss Elizabeth Rigby, who was also distinguished as an authoress.

GENERAL SOL. MEREDITH recently gained some notoriety by castigating George W. Julian, Member of Congress from Indiana. He has now gained even more by undergoing a similar operation himself at the hands of a Colonel McBride, whom he had frequently insulted, while his superior officer, at Paducah. The flogging in this case was administered in the streets of Washington.

ARLINGTON HEIGHTS still remains in the possession of the Government, but it is said that the wife of General Robert E. Lee, has recently written to a friend that she intends to return there, "even if obliged to live in the black quarters." This is indicative of the strength of her determination to reassert what she considers the right of herself and husband to this historic property.

AT Philadelphia on the 7th, Mr. Alexander Reim, a German by birth, a man of ordinary size, and a horse-tamer by profession, was united in marriage to Mrs. Hannah J. Duke, the "Iowa Giantess" her weight being 585 pounds. Among the bridal party were Chang and Eng, the Siamese Twins.

Peat for Fuel.

The feasibility of using peat as a substitute for coal was tested a few days since on engine No. 261, on the New York Central Railroad. The trial was made under the supervision of Superintendent Thomas Wallace. The locomotive drew ten freight cars from Troy to Schenectady in fifty minutes. This is better time than is usually made and the experiment in that respect resulted successfully. One difficulty was the ceaseless labor required on the part of the fireman to keep the furnace supplied. The blocks are about the size of an ordinary brick, and shoveled with great difficulty, and, as they burned very fast, required a constant opening of the furnace door, which had a tendency to keep the steam at a low point, necessitating very severe labor on the part of the fireman. Undoubtedly this could be remedied by moulding the blocks the size of a stick of wood.

—The Prairie du Chien Courier says another survey is being made, with a view of building a new railroad bridge at that point. The immense transfer business between the Milwaukee & Prairie du Chien Railway and the Northern Iowa Railroad, and its increasing demands, require further facilities, that only a railroad bridge can supply. That this bridge will be built, the Courier thinks there can be but very little doubt. The railroad charters include the bridging of the Mississippi, and we have known the project agitated by influential railroad men, and others desiring to have the work completed. This will be the second railroad bridge across the Mississippi within one hundred miles; as the Illinois Central must bridge the river at Dubuque within a year, according to the conditions of the land grant and charter.

LIABILITY OF EXPRESS COMPANIES.—An important decision was recently rendered by Judge Balcom of the Supreme Court of New York, involving the liability of Express companies. The plaintiff, who was a captain in the army, despatched from Baltimore by the defendant, certain packages and trunks to Rhode Island of which one trunk was lost. The plaintiff alleged that the trunk contained wearing apparel to the amount of $400, and sought to recover that sum. The receipt of the express company was offered as evidence, and objected to for want of a stamp, but under the law of 2864, was allowed to be stamped in court. The company's receipt or contract contained the usual limitation of liability to $50, unless the value were declared. Upon this the Judge directed a verdict for $50 and interest for the plaintiff.

—Quite an important mechanical feat is in progress of accomplishment at the great iron ore mountain, in Cornwall, Eng. This work consists of a spiral road which starts from the level of the Cornwall railroad, and revolves around the mountain, being carried along, in many places by trestle-work, or heavy embankments, and sometimes through deep cuts made through the ponderous and solid bodies of iron ore, until it reaches the very top of the mountain. A powerful locomotive has been obtained to move the trains. The spiral portion of the road will be something over two miles in length.

—The "Car Disease," which has recently appeared in New York city, and which at first was supposed to be some new contagion, is now alleged to be nothing more than a plague incident to all over-crowded lines of travel. A similar disease broke out on the line of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad in 1851, and the Missouri Steamers at an earlier date, were alleged to have innoculated thousands of persons with a similar malady. The disease is supposed to originate from the virus that escapes from the filthy cushions &c., of the cars.

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY.—"We see it stated" (says the Journal of Wednesday), "that the Canadian railroads have combined to raise the fare from Detroit to Toronto, to five dollars. Doubtless this is the Canadian interpretation of reciprocity. The American roads connecting with these Canadian lines have not raised the fare, affording a noticeable contrast. It is a striking fact that the Michigan Central is charging no higher rates—and has not been in the interim—than those of 1861."

—Two French engineers, pupils of the Ecole Centrale, have just started for Judea in order to survey the line of railroad in course of construction, and part of which will

OUR DOVES.

It is a historical fact that doves were employed as messengers. Noah used them rom his solitary ark, and at a later period lovers sent their letters by the same convenience. It must have been a pleasing sensation to the lover to hear the beak of the dove knocking at the window, bringing a letter full of that sweet and soothing assurance so dear to the doubting heart. SERIOUS ACCIDENT.—Mr. James Colvin, residing about three miles south west of this village received a severe injury on Monday morning last from the kick of a horse. He went to his barn early in the morning before daybreak to attend to his stock, and while passing behind one of his horses, with a lantern in his hand, it kicked him several times on the back of his head and neck, bruising him terribly. The wonder is that he was not killed on the spot. He is now improving however, and will probably recover.—The accident seems the more singular from the fact that Mr. Colvin was an excellent horseman, and always exercised great care in handling horses and stock. His friends have reason to congratulate themselves that the accident did not prove fatal.

DONATIONS.—The Donation visit given to the Rev. T. S. Hill on Thursday evening of last week was a very creditable affair and resulted in a present to Mr. Hill of the snug little sum of $150.—There was a large number present, and the evening passed off very pleasantly indeed. The Union and Odd Fellow's Hall is an excellent place to hold Donation parties as there is much more room than at a private house, and many more conveniences.

A Donation party for the benefit of Rev. S. E. Wishard will be held at his residence on this (Thursday) evening Feb. 1st.

ROW.—Last Friday evening the Gregg boys and Robert McKinney went into Harmon Mathias Tobacco shop and called for something to drink—and upon being refused, they took occasion to smash things generally, breaking in the windows, pushing the show case from the counter and assaulting him in a cowardly manner. Robert Gregg was arrested the next day for assault and Battery, and the thing was finally compromised by Robert paying ten dollars and costs. Such rows are a disgrace to the community and should be abated if possible.

SINGING CLASS.—Prof. Leland will commence a rudimental Singing Class in Union Hall, (this) Thursday evening Feb. 1st. This class is designed for all old and young, who wish to learn to sing Tickets for a term of 12 lessons 50cts. The second lesson will be given on Saturday at 7 o'clock P. M.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT.—On the 21st inst., a team of young horses owned by Squire Beal of Macon, became unmanageable and ran away, upsetting the wagon and seriously injuring the inmates, Mrs Beal and her son Byron. One of Mrs. Beal's arms was broken, and she was otherwise badly bruised. Both Mother and son were doing well when last heard from.

PETIT JURORS.—The following have been drawn to serve as Pettit Jurors at a term of the Lenawee Circuit Court, to be held the fourth Tuesday in Feb.

John C. Screeder, Ridgeway.
Miles Morton, Walter B. Hoag, Jas. Blowers, Cambridge.

Benjamin F Taylor.

Who is B. F. Taylor? Perhaps an answer to this question may not be valuless. And yet I wish to speak more with reference to the subject on which he is to address us on Friday, than to the man.—As a War correspondent Mr. Taylor is widely and favorably known. His power of description and beauty of language have given him perhaps the highest rank among those who have told us the events and depicted the scenes of the last four years. This, doubtless, is well known to those who will go to hear his lecture. Perhaps it is not so well known that he is a true, genuine poet. Some of the finest gems of poetry in our language have come from his pen And these fugitive pieces, the occasional overflowings of a full nature, show the same matchless power over words, and, delicacy of expression, that we find in the letters "from the front."

As a specimen of his composition in this department of literature, read the accompanying poem, "The Long Ago," and judge if he may not speak to us of the "Use and Abuse" of words. I trust all those who love to listen to a master of our language, the language of Civilization and Philanthropy, will make an effort to be present. T.

The Long Ago.

BY BENJAMIN F. TAYLOR.

Oh! a wonderous stream is the river Time,
As it runs through the realms of tears,
With a faultless rythm and a musical rhyme,
And a broadening sweep, and a surge sublime,
That blends with the ocean of years

How the winters are drifting like buds of snow,
And the summers like buds between,
And the year is the sheaf; so they come and they go,
On the river's breast with its ebb and flow,
As it glides through the shadow and sheen,

There's a musical isle in the river of Time,
Where the softest of airs are playing;
There's a cloudless sky and a tropical clime,
And a song as sweet as a vesper chime,
And the Junes with the roses are staying.

And the name of this isle is the Long Ago,
And we bury our treasures there;
There are brows of beauty and bosoms of snow;
There are heaps of dust, but we love them so,
There are trinkets and tresses of hair.

There are fragments of songs that nobody sings,
And a part of an infant's prayer;
There's a lute unswept, and a harp without strings,
There are broken vows and pieces of rings,
And the garment that she used to wear.

There are hands that are waved when the fairy shore
By the mirage is lifted in air;
And we somtimes hear through the turbulent roar
Sweet voices we heard in the days gone before,
When the wind down the river is fair.

Oh! remembered for aye be that blessed isle,
All the days of our life till night;
When the evening comes with its beautiful smile
And our eyes are closed to slumber awhile,
May our "greenwood" of soul be in sight!

GLASS BLOWERS.—The highly popular troupe of Bohemian Glass Blowers will visit this place on Monday evening Feb. 5th, and give their entertainments at Bidwell's Hall, for a few evenings only. They have a Steam Engine made entirely of glass, showing all colors and shades, which runs by steam and will be in operation during each exhibition. The also manufacture parlor ornaments which can be seen, and will be given away at the close of each exhibition. Admission 25 cents: no half price.

BEADLE'S MONTHLY.—The second number, (for February) of this Magazine has come to hand. It succeeds well in carrying out the the aim of the publishers, to "give the reading public a Magazine neither overburdened with romance, nor too weighty with thoughtful papers upon weighty themes, but to maintain that happy mein, which shall render it readable, enjoyable and useful." It is a capital magazine, worthy of general patronage.

A LARGE BUSINESS.—During the year 1865 the Old Phœnix Insurance Co. of Hartford issued 47,296 policies covering property to the amount of $60,577,851,00 and paid for fire losses exclusively, the sum of $410,613,51. The Phœnix is now the leading fire company in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Missouri, Tennessee, Mississippi, California and Oregon, and ranks as second only in Michigan. Insure with the Phoenix.—S. C. STACY, Agent.

Interesting Dialogue.

SCENE—John Smith's Country Store—TIME, Evening—SPEAKERS, Sundry Villagers, and Farmers who have "happened in as usual."

MR. SMITH.—Trade is very dull nowadays; I don't sell half as much as I did five years ago.

MR. JONES.—Good reason, Things're so high, we can't afford to buy. You charge such awful prices, Smith.

SMITH.—Can't help it. I have to pay so much more. When I sold sugar at 10 cents a pound I made a cent a pound, and I only make a cent now on 20 cents, and this cent profit don't go so far to keep my family.

BROWN.—I buy just as much as ever. I don't see as there is any change. I used to sell my 600 bushels of wheat for 75 cents a bushel, or $450. Of this, $250 went for family store bills, and $200 to pay off my farm debt. Now, when I sell for $1.50 per bushel, or 900, it takes about $500 for store bills, and leaves $400 to pay off the debt.—In fact, these high prices suit me. I wish Mr. McCulloch had kept out of the Treasury, for he threatens to make Greenbacks par, and knock down prices.

PRICE.—I don't see as it makes much difference If there is twice as much money going, and everybody gets twice as much for everything he raises, and pays twice as much for everything he buys, it all comes out square at the end; and there is this gain in the operation: those who save money or make a profit, make double, as neighbor Brown explains about his farm debt.

BUTLER.—That's so.

GREENE.—So I think.—MOORE.—So do I.

BAKER.—There is a little drawback. I keep the accounts of Widow Roberts, who has the mortgage on Brown's farm, and the $400 he pays, don't go only half so far in supporting her and educating her children.

TRAVIS (the school Teacher).—Yes it does, for I only get $30 a month for teaching Mrs. Robert's and others' children, and I used to get $25, with whert at 75c.

REV. MR. COREY.—And I only get $600 a year, while I always had $500 with wheat at 75 cents and sugar 10 cents.

SEVERAL VOICES.—That ain't quite square

KNOX, [Editor.]—And you only pay me $2 a year for my newspaper, which you thought cheap at $1,50, five years ago, though I have now to pay three times as much for every thing I use in making a newspaper.

GREENE.—Why don't you raise your prices too?

KNOX.—People won't stand it. I must keep along with no profit, or even at a loss, hoping for better times, or lose my subscribers, and let the paper go down. Why, when I raised the price from $1.50 to $2 a year, a good many stopped the paper—among them Brown himself, though I paid him double for his wheat.

BROWN.—I didn't stop it so much for the price; I went in for paying for my farm by extra economy.

KNOX.—Yes, he followed my advice for people "to economize and pay their debts now." But let us see if Mr. Brown began at the right place. On one Saturday I published in my paper that wheat had advanced 15 cents a bushel. On Monday Brown went to market with his wheat, and sold 60 bushels at one cent advance over the old price, and thought he did well. He came home boasting about it, until he met neighbor Johnston, who got the 15 cents advance, because he read my paper, and was wide-awake. Brown's loss on 60 bushels would pay four whole years' subscription.

BROWN.—Don't say anything more about that, Knox, and put me down a subscriber for life.

KNOX.—I have heard of several other such losses by those who stopped my paper. Not to be personal, as some of them are here, I will call them A. B. C, etc. A. paid 4 per cent more fees on $7, taxes, because he did not see the collector's notice in my paper, and thus lost $2.84, to save $2. B. paid $3,60 the same way. C failed to bring in his claim against an estate, because he did not see in my paper the legal notice limiting the time. That cost him $34, to save $2 subscription, D. sold 200 pounds of wool at 62 cents, because he did not see an advertisement of Smith, right here at home, offering 70 cents. That cost him $16, to save $2. F's boys went down to the village every night or two, to get the news and local gossip, because they had no paper at home, and one of them fell into bad company, and is ruined. I know twenty cases where people lost money for not learning what is going on. I gather up all that is going on in business and society, and condense it into my colums. It is important for every man to know all about home matters, and I doubt if there is a man in this whole town who would not, in the course of a year, get some information, that would pay him back more than $2 a year. And then think of a household sitting down together 365 days in a year and having nothing to talk about, except their own affairs, and a few items of gossip, gathered up by occasional contact with other people.

TAYLOR.—Let me help Editor Knox's argument. Wife read to me an item he published about a humbug, which he copied from the American Agriculturist, of New York City. Next day one of those same humbugs came round with his article, and was so plausible that he almost persuaded her into paying him $3, for his swindling recepe; but the editor's caution kept her back.

KNOX.—Yes, and do you know that the fellow sold more than fifty of the humbug recipes hereabout, at $3 a piece? but not to any one of my subscribers

POTTS.—Put me down as a subscriber, Knox, here is your two dollars.

SHAW.—And me too.

KNOX.—Thank you, gentlemen. I'll try to make a better paper than ever. Every dollar helps: a new subscriber only adds to my expense the cost of paper. If everybody took the paper, and thus divided the cost of getting news, setting type, offic rent, etc., I could double the value of the paper to each Please talk the matter over with other neighbors and see if it cannot be done.

SEVERAL VOICES.—We will.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK.

A whole flock of Fenian rumors is just set loose, to the effect that Liverpool is full of Fenians, the public buildings in London are undermined and to be blown up, Ireland is to be placed under martial law, and Fenian demonstrations in the United States are to be suppressed. Thomas Francis Meagher is to be Fenian dictator, Canada is to be invaded and Maximilian assisted.

Advices from Mexico are important. The Liberal General Morales had defeated the Imperialists, but was subsequently defeated by them with heavy loss. Mr. Wm. M. Evarts, of New York, has at last settled down to the work of preparing for the trial of Jefferson Davis, and is "not at home" to visitors, being engaged in overhauling the records of trials for treason since days of the Stuarts. The Government, it is said, pays Mr. Evarts a fee of one hundred thousand dollars in this case, a sum which is not an exorbitant charge for his professional services, when it is considered that his business is now over fifty thousand dollars per year, and must suffer to a great extent during his preparations for and attendance on the trial of the President of the late "Confederacy."

A sharp trick was played in New York on the 27th by a thief pretending to be a policeman, by which he robbed a bank porter of $30,000.

Bills were presented, to prescribe an oath of office and repeal the test oath of 1862; to regulate suffrage in the District of Columbia; to provide for the defence of the North Carolina frontier; for the admission of Colorado as a state; and for the construction of a ship canal around Niagara Falls. A resolution was adopted directing inquiry into the expediency of constructing a military road from the western border of Minnesota to the gold fields of Idaho and Montana.

GLEANINGS.

—An important decision as to the rights of pedestrians has just been made by Judge Morell, of the Supreme Court of New York city. He decides that the right to travel on a street or highway is common to all. It does not belong exclusively to drivers of vehicles. Foot passengers have the right to walk upon them, and, except for the greater difficulty of guarding and arresting the progress of vehicles, it is, as a matter of law, as much the duty of vehicles to keep out of the way of foot passengers, as it is for the latter to escape being run over by the former. The use of the streets of cities and villages, and of highways, for railroads, is allowed only because it is considered not to be a substantial interference with their free and unobstructed use as highways for passage. So long, therefore, as there is no interference with the public right of passage, railroads are lawful structures. But if operated upon the theory of exclusive right to their track, they become usurpers and wrongdoers.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

A stepmother's long abuse of a little boy only six years old—her stepson—at Lyons, N. Y., has resulted in his death. She would whip him for hours, till the fiendish creature was compelled to desist by the interference of her neighbors. She forced the poor little thing to eat the worst offal; and his death was caused by locking him up and leaving him for three days during the recent cold weather. When found he was frozen stiff.

Five murders were committed at Indianapolis within the 24 hours ending Friday evening, the 26th.

A very painful accident occurred at one of the schools in Fond du Lac, recently. When the teacher left the school-room at noon she gave the key to the young ladies, and told them to keep the door locked until she returned. During her absence a number of young boys came to the school-room door, and amused themselves by looking through the key-hole. One of the young ladies, in sport, thrust a small stick through the key-hole, which entered the eye of one of the boys, and put it out instantly. The names of the parties we did not learn.

A robbery took place at Chattanooga, on Monday, the 15th inst., which, if the facts are stated correctly, is one of the most extraordinary on record. Two men named Bass and Williams, pretending to be detectives from Columbus, Georgia, persuaded a Lieutenant of the military guard to render them assistance, went to the Crutchfield House, dragged several gentlemen out of bed, carried them to the guard house, plundering them of over two thousand dollars in money, watches, etc., and kept them locked up that night, and the next day started south. Some weeks ago, the Sandwich, (Illinois) Gazette reported the supposed murder of Mr. John Smith of Squaw Grove. His team came home with Mr. Smith lying on the load with a deep wound in the back of his head, and nearly dead. But the wound was made in a very singular manner. Mr. Smith was sick, and lying on the top of the wagon-load, he protruded his head over the front end-board, and began to vomit, and while in that position, was kicked on the head by one of horses—the skull being laid open by the shoe-cork. He was not dead when he came home, but lived long enough to give the above account.

At Quincy, Ill., on Sunday, the 21st a little boy, about three or four years old, the son of Mr. Williams, while out in the street was attacked by a cow, and so severely injured that he died within a few hours after. PERSONAL.

A RATHER embarrassing occurrance took place last week at the Philadelphia Academy of Music, during the presentation of the opera "Il Poliuto." Zucchi, the prima donna was enthusiastically applauded for her rendering of a solo in the first act, and in response repeated it with even greater effect. This was followed by a tremendous storm of applause even greater than the first, and she stepped before the curtain, bowed her acknowledgments, and was about to sing the solo a third time, when she discovered that Gen. Grant had just entered the building, and the last outburst was a popular tribute to the most famous general of the age.

TALLYRAND was once in the company o Madame de Stael and another eminent French lady whose name we do not remember. "You say charming things of both of us," said Madame de Stael to him, "which of us do you like the best?" The wily statesman artfully replied that he was delighted with both. "Ah, but you prefer one of us," continued Madame de Stael; "suppose we were both drowning in the Seine to-night, which would you help first?" "I would give my right hand to Madame de Stael, and my left hand to Madame ———." "Yes, but suppose only one of us could be saved, which would you attempt to rescue?" Talleyrand's diplomacy was pushed to its severest test, but not one whit discomposed, he turned to Madame de Stael, and replied: "Madame, you know so many things, you doubtless know how to swim."

CURIOUS OBSTACLES TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE TELEGRAPH IN INDIA.—From an article in the Atlantic Monthly for December, we extract the following passages:

"The establishment of the electric telegraph in India presented some curious, as well as difficult problems. In the first place, it was discovered that the air of India is in a state of constant electrical perturbation of the strongest kind, so that the instruments there mounted, went into a high fever, and refused to work. Along the north and south lines, a current of electricity was constantly passing, which threw the needles out of gear, and baffled the signalers. Moreover the tremendous thunder-storms ran up and down the wires and melted the conductors. The monsoon winds tore the teak posts out of the sodden ground; the elephants and buffaloes tramped the fallen lines into kinks and tangles; the delta aborigines carried off the timber supports for fuel, and the wire or iron rods upon them to make bracelets and supply the Hindoo smitheries; and the cotton and ice boats, kedging up and down the river, dragged the sub-aqueous wires to the surface.

"In addition to these graver difficulties, were many of an amusing character. Wild pigs and tigers scratched their skins against the posts in the jungles, and porcupines and bandicoots burrowed them out of the ground. Kites, fishing eagles and hooded crows, came in hundreds and perched upon the line to see what an earth it could mean, and sometimes, after a thunder storm, when the wires were wet, were found dead by dozens, the victims of their own curiosity. Monkeys climbed the posts and ran along the wires, chattering and dropping an interfering tale from one wire to another, which tended to confound conversation with Calcutta."

HOW A MAN FEELS WITH HIS HEAD CUT OFF.—It is considered on all sides that the body does not feel one instant after decapitation, for the brain being the seat of sensation to the whole frame through the medium of the spinal marrow, every part of the body beneath the joint at which the latter may be divided must be deprived of feeling. But it by no means follows that the head is deprived of sensation immediately after decapitation, nor that it may not retain its consciousness, and, like the head of the Irish Knight, who was killed by Saladin in the Holy War, get up andd eclare that it was never cut off by so sweet a scimitar before—nor like that of the assassin Tegare, swear roundly at the executioner for not keeping a keener axe; but it is quite possible that it may be troubled with serious reflections upon the irrevocability of its fate, and the awfulness of its deprivation. In support of this unpleasant theory, many facts adduced, with grave vouchers for their authencity. Among others is the unfortunate Queen of Scotts, whose lips continued to move in prayer for at least a quarter of an hour after the executioner had performed his duties. Widt states that having put his mouth to the ear of a decapitated criminal's head, and called him by name, the eyes turned to the side from whence the voice came; and the fact is attested by Fontanelle, Magore, Guiltotine, Nauche and Aldini. On the word "murder" being called, in the case of a criminal executed for that crime at Coblenz, the half closed eyes opened wide with an expression of reproach on those who stood around.

THE BIRTH OF GREEN ERIN.

Can any reader of the Commercial inform us who is the author of the following beautiful verses, found some years ago in an exchange? There is an unusual vigor of imagination displayed, joined to the versification, and a knowledge of the patois which is delicious.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Yes, we can. It was written some sixteen or seventeen years ago, in New York city, by a young Irishman named Moore, and appeared in that very clever story published originally in the Brother Jonathan, we believe, entitled "TOM STAPLETON"—a sketch which never received half the circulation and credit its merits deserved.—Buffalo Commercial.

Wid all condescinshin,
I'd look frout at thishin
To what I would monshin of Erin so green;
And widout hesitayshin,
I'd show how that nayshin
Became ay creashyn the gim and the queen.

It happened wan mornin',
Widout any warnin',
That Vaynus was born in the beautiful say;
An' bein the same token
(An' cause it was provokin',)
Her pinions were soakin', and wouldn't give play.

So Neptune who knew her,
Began to purshue her,
In ordher to woo her the wicked owld Jew;
An' he very nigh caught her.
Atop of the wather,
Orate Jupither's daughter, who cried poo-ta-loo.

But Jove the great Jaynious,
Looked down an' saw Vaynus,
An' Neptune as naynus purshuin her wild,
So he roared out in thunther
He'd tear him asunder,
An' sure 'twas no wonder, for tasing his child,

So a sthar that was flyin'
Around him espyin',
He gaz'd widout sighin' an' hurled it below,
Where it tumbled like winkin'
On Neptune while sinkin',
An' give him I'm thinkin', a broth iv a blow!

An' that sthar thin was dryland,
Both lowland and highland,
An' formed a swate island the land of me birth;
Thus plain is the story,
'Kase sint down from glory,
That Erin so hoary's a heaven on earth!

Then Vaynus jumped nately
On Erin so sthately,
But faynted, 'kase lately so bothered and priss,d
Which much did bewilder;
But ere it had killed her
Her father distilled her drops of the blist.

An' that glass so victorious,
It made her feel glorious,
A little uproarious I fear I might prove;
Hince how can you blame us
That Erin's so famous
For beauty, an' murther, an' whiskey an' love!

American Humor.

* * * * American humor has a flavor peculiar to itself. It smells of the soil. It is an indigenous home growth. Like the native wines of a country, it has an aroma of its own, and is not made up to imitate the Champagnes and Burgundies of a different climate. And if its qualities have not yet been fully developed, there is hope that with careful cultivation, it may be brought to future excellence. It is perhaps natural that this particular literary product should be the first to show the capacities of the country. Here is some reason for the analogy often drawn between the youth of a people and the youth of an individual; and a young man often shows an admirable humor before he has developed corresponding faculties in other directions. To take one striking example—Mr. Dickens displayed all the peculiar characteristics of his humor, if, indeed, he did not give the most perfect example of it, in "PICKWICK," almost his first publication, and written at a very early age. No man can have the stock of thought which is necessary for philosophical or scientific excellence, nor even the stock of experience and observation of life which is necessary for a really great novelist, until he has grown out of his first youth. He can scarcely, in spite of some remarkable examples to the contrary, have enriched his imagination sufficiently to be a great poet. But it is certainly possible for him to show his sense of humor. To account for this, it would be necessary, if it were desirable, to explain what we mean by humor—a task which we may at once decline as a hopelessly impracticable one. The profound psychologists and critics who have tried this have at a definition, have signally broken down. We know, indeed, that, unless our national boast is ill-founded (a supposition not to be entertained for a moment), humor is something for which Englishmen are pre-eminently distinguished, and in which Frenchmen are so deficient that they have even to borrow our name for it. Rabelais and Moliere and Voltaire and one or two other writers have certainly some faculty which, to the naked eye, strongly resembles it; but when we look at them through a good pair of English glasses, we see that it isn't the genuine article. As for Germans, it need not be said that they are about as sensitive to humor as so many apple dumplings. The surgical operation which, as sanguine enthusiasts have supposed, might get a joke into the head of a Scotchman, would be thrown away upon a German. Sauerkraut, or Bavarian beer, or home-grown tobacco, seem to act as effectual prophylactics. Trying a joke upon a genuine German is like tickling a rhinoceros with a straw, or rather like digging Mr. Wardell's fat boy in the ribs; you may possibly send a ripple over his surface, but you don't penetrate the outside layer. They are, it is true, an amusable people, as is sufficiently demonstrated by their taking pleasure in that dreariest of comic periodicals, Kladderadatsch—a performance which is to Charivari, what Bavarian beer is to Champagne. A Frenchman, though exquisitely witty, does not often show that tenderness of feeling which, combined with wit (if we make a dogmatic assertion about two unknown things), favors the development of humor. A German has tenderness enough and to spare, but is apt to be deficient in the quick play of intellect which produces wit. Our best English humorists have presented the happy combination where the feelings are at the right distance from the intellect, so that the sparks struck out by wit fall instantly upon our sentiment. Or, perhaps, a Frenchman passes too quickly over the associated ideas to get the full meaning out of them; and a German dwells upon them too long and too heavily. Whatever the philosophy of wit and humor may be, they depend to some extent upon detecting resemblances and contrasts which lie upon the surface and will not bear a laborious examination. Everybody feels that Sidney Smith made an exquisitely humorous remark, when he said that it was so hot that he could take off his flesh and sit in his bones; and that Charles Lamb was more profoundly humorous in the "Dissertation upon Roast-Pig." To take, for example, a sentence: "See him (the sucking pig) in the dish, his second cradle, how meek he lieth! Would'st thou have this innocent grow up to the grossness and indocility which too often accompany maturer swinehood?" The touch about the second cradle is inimitable. But if a prosaic monster should insist upon analyzing the expressions—upon determining the degree of resemblance between a pig's dish and his cradle, or upon determining the exact meaning to be attributed to Sidney Smith's metaphor of sitting in your bones, the whole beauty of the comparisons would evaporate. You might as well try to analyze the savor of roast-pig by dissecting him with a carving knife.

The power of catching superficial resemblances by a mysterious intellectual instinct is as likely (as we have before remarked) to exist in a young man as in an old one. It is even more likely to be found where the perceptive faculties are still fresh and vigorous, before we have settled down into a prosaic way of looking at things; before our minds have stiffened and our intellectual epidermis become thickened by the wear and tear of life. It is true that those happy constituted men, who retain their impressibility, will acquire a richer humor as their minds become stored by new ideas. The humor of Hamlet or of Jaques would be inconceivable in a very young man. But the peculiar cast of humor by which any man will be hereafter distinguished is generally displayed as conspicuous in his youth as at a later period.

It is a very difficult task to find the epithet which ought to make the peculiarities of American humor intelligible to those who do not already understand all that can be said to them. No one can put into words the difference between the scent of a rose and a wall-flower. A single experiment will do more than any quantity of explanation. And, therefore, when we attempt to seize some of the main characteristics of American humor, we are only trying by very ineffectual means to teach what any one may learn far better from five minutes' study of the "BIGELOW PAPERS." A whole stream of American humor has lately been turned upon us. "ARTEMUS WARD," the "ORPHEUS C. KERR PAPERS," the LETTERS OF "MAJOR DOWNING," and various other facetious performances, have made their appearance on this side of the Atlantic. As a rule, nothing is more difficult than for one nation to laugh at the jokes which amuse another. A great philosopher used to laugh till the tears ran down his cheeks at the sight of two spiders fighting; our inability to perceive the joke may, possibly, be a proof of our dullness, not of his childishness. Englishmen and Yankees are, however, so far of one family as to appreciate each other's humor. Some of the papers we have mentioned contain very small jokes; but English railway travelers certainly buy them and chuckle over them. Their humor only differs from ours as another species of the same genius. And therefore we may appreciate it sufficiently to see how this variety is connected with certain other national peculiarities. It is not so unlike as to be placed outside our sphere of criticism, and yet it is unlike enough to suggest the necessity of some explanation.

There is a contrast between different American writers which strikes us. The United States are, as we know, the land which is or ought to be bounded on the East by the Atlantic Ocean, on the West by the setting sun, on the North by the aurora borealis, and on the South by the Day of Judgment. The language of their orators not unfrequently corresponds to the magnitude of the national idea. There have been many successors to the inimitable Elijah Program. His well known bursts of eloquence are, like many of Mr. Dickens' imitations, a good deal more lively than reality, but they strike the true note. The subject of his eloquence was "verdant as are the mountains of our country, bright and flowing as are our mineral ticks, unspiled by withering conventionalities as are our broad and boundless prearers. Rough he may be, so air our bars; wild he may be, so air our buffalers; but he is the child of nature, and the child of freedom, and his boastful answer to the despot and tyrant is, that his bright home is in the settin' sun."

We could quote nothing from the originals so good as the imitation. It is a kind of portable soup, an ounce of which diluted with water would produce a gallon of Fourth of July oration. The originals generally make their "tall talk" dull as well as bombastic. The contrast of which we have spoken is that between the manufacturers and the consumers of this eloquence. The genuine Yankee is the incarnation of shrewd common sense. It seems strange that he should be taken in by this "wind bag" style of oratory. One would as soon expect a flat-fish to rise at a salmon fly. He has such a keen eye for a fact, that one expect him to detect mere flummery. The explanation is, perhaps, simple. Every half educated person first tries to be eloquent by piling up big words, and to be forcible by employing strong ones. He has read enough to to understand sesquipedalian expressions, and his taste is not polished enough to see through them. We see something of the same kind whenever an English penny-a-liner tries to be impressive. But it is also characteristic of the Americans that this bombast not only exists side by side with a peculiarly dry humor, but gradually passes into it. The perpetrator of unconscious absurdities gradually begins to manufacture them consciously and of malice prepense. He talks in 'Ercles vein and winks at us, as if he saw the joke himself. The mere buncombe of orators passes into the quaint exaggerations characteristic of the Western States, who describe themselves as half-horse, half alligator, with a dash of the earthquake. The most outrageous bombast of the war proceeded from the notorious Parson Brownlow, who said, if we remember right, that he proposed, if necessary, to fight the "Sesesh" till hell froze, and then to fight them on the ice. The strong touch of profanity which is here characteristically introduced, produces another distinct form of exaggerated language. It is common, especially in the South-western States, to meet people who seem to have made a study of the art of profane swearing. They invent new and curious oaths. They systematically interlard every sentence with a choice collection of peculiar epithets. They absolutely corruscate into explosions of new-fangled oaths, going off like some novel piece of fireworks. It is obviously impossible to quote any appropriate specimens of this language.

The use of very big words, either seriously, or as a more or less consciously absurd piece of extravagance, is not the really characteristic part of American humor. There are, indeed, two ways of producing a comic effect which may be considered as the inverse of each other. An absurd overstatement or an absurd understatement may be equally effective. When Falstaff tells Randolph that his face is an "everlasting bonfire light;" that he has "saved him a thousand marks in links and torches, walking in the night betwixt tavern and tavern," he gives a good specimen of the first. A well known American example is the assertion of the Mississippi captain, that his boat would float wherever the ground was a little damp. To illustrate the second, we might quote the American, who had managed to quote something in his native country to parallel all the wonders of Europe. At last he was asked whether he had not just crossed the Alps. "Well," he replied, "I guess I passed some risin' ground." The philosophy of the two methods is perhaps the same; but the second is commoner amongst the genuine American humorists. When Artemus Ward describes his courtship, he begins by informing his beloved that she was a gazelle, which, he remarks, "I thought was putty fine." He goes on, "I wish thar was winders to my soul, so that you could see some of my feelin's. There's fire enough in here to bile all the corn-beef and turnips in the neighborhood. Vesoovius and the critter ain't a circumstance!" To all which, the lady replies, after some more attempts at eloquence on the approved models, "You say rite strate out what you are drivin' at. If you mean gettin' hitched, I'm in!" This may be taken as an illustration of the nature of the real popular humor. It is to a considerable extent a protest by shrewd common sense against the bombast which is so prevalent, but which does not quite succeed in passing itself off for genuine. When a man, naturally acute, is set down to hear orators spout nonsense, he is sometimes sufficiently awed to accept it for genuine,—he feels that he is not entitled to be a critic; but his native sense enables him to have occasional glimpses of its absurdity, and he expresses himself in rather coarse but very terse condemnation.

The original source of American humor is therefore to be looked for in such men as Franklin. He was the incarnation of that popular wisdom which generates proverbs and fables. His philosophy never soars above a rather low level; it takes the form of very racy maxims—of the great family to which belong the axioms about a penny saved being a penny got, and the advantages gained by being early to bed and early to rise. A characteristic story is the one which he told to console Jefferson for the alterations made in the draft of the Declaration of Independence. A friend of his had put up as a sign, a neatly painted hat, with the inscription, "John Brown, hatter, makes and repairs hats for ready money." One acquaintance suggested that the hat was not wanted, as the inscription explains his trade. A second observed that the remark about ready money was imprudent; a third, that as every hatter made and repaired hats, the words after "hatter" might be left and nothing substituted; and a fourth, that every one knew that he was a hatter, or would see the hats in the window; so that the inscription was reduced to "John Brown." Moral: don't be too sensitive to your friends' advice. The same vein of humor appears in the innumerable anecdotes about Mr. Lincoln, who is the exact illustration of the great stratum of American society which forms the real strength of the nation, but is very feebly represented by its newspapers and politicians. It is enough to allude to one or two of Mr. Lincoln's well known sayings. There is the one illustrating the difficulty of joining the North and South—about the architect who said that he could build a bridge to the infernal regions, on which his friend remarked that he had "some doubts about the abutment on the 'other side.'" There is his answer to some one who requested him to interfere about some trifling detail, telling how the captain of a flatboat was asked by a father to stop in the middle of a dangerous rapid, that his little boy might pick up an apple which he had dropped overboard; or there is the last hint which he gave about reconstruction in reference to the new State government in Louisiana, that it is better to hatch your eggs than to break them. The sayings rightly or wrong attributed to him, with the invariable commencement, "I knew a man down West," may all be described as half-baked proverbs. If they were a little more compressed, and had a rather wider application, they might easily become proverbial, and would contain a philosophy very superior to Mr. Tupper's. They excellently represent the peculiar national humor, as, indeed, many of them were no doubt sayings at large upon society, to which Mr. Lincoln was forced to act as sponsor.

ARTEMUS WARD is, on the whole, the best specimen of the last crop of humorists. He, it is true, owes something to his system of spelling, which is a small enough form of wit. There isn't very much fun in writing "hence4th," or in putting "goakin" for joking. Eccentric spelling is as necessary in the BIGLOW PAPERS as it is in BURNS, because it is a genuine attempt to give the dialect of the country. Every humorist neces-arily loses a great deal by not being able to represent the peculiar nasal drawl, which seems to correspond to the mental attitude of the speaker. Many of the most excellent sayings in all conversation won't keep. Deprived of the manner, and of the dramatic dialogue which explains them at the time, they become stupid; they cannot retain their brilliancy in a dry state. The spelling which represents the original pronunication is therefore a fair expedient; but the arbitrary blunders, such as quoting "Hamlet's Soliloquy," "2 B or not 2 B"—are simply unmeaning. There are, however, better things than this in Artemus, and in his visit to the Mormons he has even ventured to spell correctly. His humor has the genuine Yankee cast, although it does not contain very brilliant specimens. He only occasionally writes on political topics, which are the staple of most of his imitators and rivals. We may quote one or two bits from his visit to the Mormons, as examples of his style. In passing through Nevada he remarks: "Shooting isn't as popular in Nevada as it once was. A few years since they used to have 'dead man for breakfast'" (a playful Californian phrase) "every morning. A reformed desperado told me that he supposed he had killed men enough, to stock a graveyard. 'A feeling of remorse,' he said, 'sometimes comes over me! But I'm an altered man now. I hain't killed a man for over two weeks. What'll yer poison yourself with?" he added, dealing a resonant blow on the bar." This is followed by a story of a notorious desperado, whose practice it was to call for liquor, and, if any one declined joining him, "to commence shooting." At last, on a refusal of some stranger, he drew his revolver and exclaimed, "Good God, must I kill a man every time I come to Carson?" with which pathetic words, "of sorrow rather than of anger," he fired and killed his man. "The citizens," however, thought this a trifle too much and shot the murderer down with rifles. This is the kind of story which the narrator tells with imperturable gravity of countenance, pleased if you laugh, and doubly pleased if you are credulous enough to be awed. He describes Mormonism with the same kind of humorous calmness. In his imaginary visit to Brigham Young, when the prophet says in answer to a question, "'I hev eighty wives, Mister Ward. I sertinly am married,' 'How do you like it as far as you hev got?' sed I." In his real visit he seems to have taken much the same point of view. "Brigham Young," he says, "is a man of real natural ability. If you ask me how pious he is, I treat it as a conundrum, and give it up." But he speaks civilly of the Mormons, who are fond of balls, shows, and theatres. The plays have to be modified, as one of the Mormons left a representation of the Lady of Lyons together with his twenty-four wives, because he wouldn't see a play where a man made such a cussed fuss over one woman. Perhaps his best story, as one illustrative of the worst side of Yankee shrewdness, relates to a conversation which he professes to have heard in a new England store to the following effect:—

"Say, Bill, wot you done with the sorril mare of yours?"

"Sold her," said William with a chuckle of satisfaction.

"Wo'd you git?"

"Hund'd an' fifty dollars cash down."

"How! Hund'd an' fifty for that kickin' spavin' critter? Who'd you sell her to?"

"Sold her to mother!"

"Wot!" exclaimed brother No. 1, "did you really sell that kickin' spavin'd critter to mother? Wall, you air a shrewd one!"

Humorous literature in America, as well as every other kind of literature, has been of late chiefly devoted to the war as the one great topic of interest. We may remark, by the way, that a very unfair criticism has been made by some writers, who seem to fancy that we stopped all joking during the Crimean war; that Punch whilst it lasted, never made a hit at Lord Aberdeen, or that Gilray never caricatured Pitt in the revolutionary wars. The Americans, it was said, joked about the war because their hearts were not in it. This is simply absurd. Rightly or wrongly, they certainly gave every proof of being absorbed in the war to an almost incredible extent. That was, however, no reason why they should abandon the use of their trenchant and sometimes rather grim style of humor. When some one reproached President Lincoln for his jokes during some of the worst part of the war, he replied, that but for such a relaxation he could not have borne the weight of anxiety. His last very touching inaugural message gives, no doubt, the most prevailing color of his mind, which was an almost pathetic melancholy; and, indeed, it may be observed that men with a very strong sense of humor are disposed to melancholy intervals. We don't suppose that the occasional facetiousness of the American people was the consequence of any such necessity for relief, but it was certainly as compatible with the deepest sentiment. The general tone of thought though not the method of expression, may be fairly imagined by taking one of the average Englishmen, who, as an Englishman, condemed the war heartily; thought it was nonsense to fight to force men into brotherly kindness; considered the Abolitionists to be humbugs, and the United States to be running into hopeless bankruptcy. Such a man, transplanted for a sufficient time, would absorb the popular prejudices of his new soil. He would adopt as blindly a different set of national commonplaces. He would insensibly substitute a fanatical belief in an idol called the Union for a belief in old England; he would hate humbugs and agitators and corrupt jobs heartily, and unreasonable philantrophy more heartily still. The hatred which Englishman felt for "red tape" in the Crimean war, and the contempt which they (some of them at least) have expressed for nigger-worshippers during the Jamaica troubles, may represent the feelings of the genuine Yankee population towards greenbacks and shoddy aristocracies on the one hand, and the irrepressible negro on the other. We who wished honestly to see the nigger free, hated him as the cause of the troubles, and as our English or "Anglo-Saxon" breed always hates an inferior race. The battery of the humorists is generally directed to play upon these obnoxious objects. The prevalent view of the nigger is excellently put by Artemus Ward "Feller sitterzens, the Afrikan may be our brother . . . ., but the Afrikan isn't our sister and our wife and our uncle. He isn't several of our brothers, and all our first wife's relations. He isn't our grandfather and our great grandfather, and our aunt in the country. Scarcely; and yet numeris persons would have us think so . . . . But we've got the Afrikan or rather he's got us, and now what air we going to do about it? He's a orful noosance. P'raps he isn't to blame for it. P'raps he was created for sum wise purpuss, like the measles and New Englan' rum; but it's mity hard to see it." The reckless Government expenditure is tolerably satirized in the "Orpheus C. Kerr Papers;" which, however, are, as a rule, very poor. The author goes to see the trial of a gun, similar to those used at the Revolution, only that it was painted green instead of blue, and had a larger touch-hole. Being pointed at a target 60 yards off, the target is not hit, and no ball can be found. After great surprise, somebody looks into the mouth and observes that the ball has not gone out at all. "The inventor said this would happen sometimes, especially if you didn't put a brick over the touch-hole when you fired the gun." The Government orders forty guns on the spot, at 200,000 dollars a piece. This is rather a ponderous attempt at witticism, but is enough to indicate the nature of a good deal of popular facetiousness. Another side of the negro question is touched upon in Ward's visit to Richmond after the siege.

"My, brother, I sed to a cullerd purson, air you aware that you've bin 'mancipated? Do you realize how glorious it is to be free? tell me, my dear brother, does it not seem like some dream, or do you realize the great fact in all it's lovin' and holy magnitood?"

"He said he would take some gin."

Another bit in the same vein illustrates the feeling towards the Southern whites. Artemus remarks:—"There is raly a great deal of Union sentiment in this city—I see it on ev'ry hand. I met a man to-day who said, "Why, we've been fightin' agin the old flag! Lor' bless me, how singular!' He then borrowed five dollars of me and bust into a flood of tears." And the general verdict on the war is summed up as follows, at the end of a conversation with a "prowd and hawty Suthener."

"Young man, adoo. You Southern fellows is probably my brothers, though you've occasionally had a cussed queer way of showin' it! It's over now. Let's all give in and make a country on this continent that shall give all Europa the cramp in the stummack every time they look at us. Adoo, adoo! And as I'm through I'll likewise say adoo to you, gentle reader, merely remarking, that the star-spangled banner is wavin' round loose agin, and that there don't seem to be anything the matter with the Goddess of Liberty beyond a slight cold."

With which characteristic touch of Mr. Ward's we must leave him. Though not very brilliant, he fairly represents the average popular sentiment. A much higher representative of the political feeling of the country is to be found in Mr. Lowell, author of the "Biglow Papers." The first series of those papers, which reflects the sensation produced in the North by the Mexican war, and the annexation of Texas, was to many people the first revelation of American humor. Although they would require a commentary to enable the English reader fully to understand their allusions, their brilliant hits, enclosed in language equally quaint and caustic, impressed many unacquainted with American politics. Such a verse as this fixes itself on the memory, although the reader might have never heard of General Jackson's letter, in which the expression about "area of freedom" occurs, nor even have known who the famous General was, and still less who were Cass and Calhoun:

The mass ough' to labor and we lay on soffies,
That's the reason I want to spread Freedom's aree;
It puts all the cumin'est on us in office,
An' reclines our Maker's orig'nal idee,
Sez John C. Calhoun, sez he;—
Thet's ez plain, says Cass
As that some one's an ass,
It's ez clear as the sun is at noon, sez he.

Most of the humor of which we have quoted examples, is what may be called "applied humor." It is the result of shrewd, and for the most part half-educated minds, acting upon matters of every-day interest, amongst which, of course, politics occupy a prominent part in America. We should, in order to complete the subject, take notice of the pure humor; of humor, that is, which exists only for its own sake, and which scarcely arises until there has grown up a class with taste for literary leisure, and which goes through intellectual exercises for the love of them. Such, for example, are Charles Lamb's exquisite Essays, whose existence is sufficient to justify themselves. We read them not to learn, but for the pleasure of the exquisite style and graceful play of thought. Of this kind of humor, it may be supposed that we shall meet with few examples in America, from their love of the practical, and from the smaller number of finished scholars. A man doesn't begin to write pure humor or Latin verses till he has time on his hands. Artemus Ward can only be classed one degree above the wax-figure showman whom he personates. He is not enough of an intellectual being to come up to the character we require. Washington Irving and Mr. Hawthorne showed some very delicate humor, but it was scarcely original enough to be distinctly American. It reminded us not distantly of European models. We can, however, mention one writer who has shown a very distinctive and thoroughly national humor; we mean Dr. Holmes. He shows the peculiar shrewdness of his countrymen, but applied to more refined objects of thought. He is often quaint, but is never guilty of transgressing the bounds of really good taste. It is, however, unfair to attempt a summary of his merits at the end of an article, and we will, therefore, conclude our quotations.

Ladies, fret not over small losses. Otherwise you soon have that great loss, the loss of beauty, to fret over.

ON SKATING.

Havin herd much sed about skating-parks, and the grate amount ov helth and muscle they wos imparting tew the present generashun at a slite advanse from fust cost, I bought a ticket and went within the fense.

I found the ice in a slippery condishun, covring about 5 akers ov artyfishall water, which waz owned bi a stock company, and freezes.

Upon wun side ov the pond was ereckted little grosery buildings, where the wimmin sot on benchis while the fellers (kivvered with blushes) hitched the magic iron tew their feet.

It waz a most exsiting scene: the sun waz n the ski—and the wind waz in the air—and the birds ware in the South—and the snow waz on the ground—and the ice lay shivvering with a bad kold—and angells (ov both genders) flucktuated past me pro and con, 2 and fro; here a little and there a good deal.

It waz a most exsiting scene; i wanted tu holler "Bully," or lay down and roll over.

But i kept in, and aked with glory.

Helth waz pictured on manny a nobell brow.

Az the femail angells put out ov the pond, side by side with male angells, it waz the most powerfull scene i ever stood behind.

The long red tape from their necks swum in the breeze, and the feathers in the jockeys fluttered in the breeze, and other things (tew mutch tew menshun) fluttered in the breeze.

I don't think i ever waz more crazee before in my life—on ice.

For 2 long hours i stood and gazed with dum excitement.

I felt like a kanall hoss turned suddenly out tew grass.

I didn't know how to proceed.

Az one ov the angells, more sudden than awl the rest, cum fliein down the trak, 3 lengths ahed ov her male angell, awl eyes ware gorging with her heavenly bust ov speed; she seemed tew have cut luce from earth, and waz bound South, for the Cape ov Good Hope, when awl tew onst, with a gorgours swoop terriffick, down crumbling into a limped heap she went, with squeal teriffick, a living lovely mass ov dissastrus skirt and tapering ankle.

Awl gathered around the bursted angell; but lo! in a minnitt's space, her wings agin was plumed, and evry feather was in its lawful plase; and on she fled, laffing like wine thru its buteous blushes.

I had saw enuff—more happyness than belonged tew me—and az i sloly wended back tew mi hum at the tavurn i felt—good.

ON AMERIKANS.

Amerikans love caustick things; they would prefer turpintine tew colone-water, if they had tew drink either.

So with their relish of humor; they must hav it on the half-shell with kayenne.

An Englishman wants hiz fun smothered deep in mint sauce, and he iz willing tew wait till next day before he tastes it.

If yu tickle or convince an Amerikan, yu hav got tew dew it quick.

An Amerikan luvs to laff, but he don't luv tew make a bizzness ov it; he works, eats, and haw-haws on a canter.

I guess the English hav more wit, and the Amerikans more humor.

We havn't had time, yet, tew bile down our humor and git the wit out ov it.

The English are better punsters, but i konsider punning a sort ov literary prestitushun in which future happiness iz swopped oph for the plezzure ov the moment.

Thare iz one thing i hav noticed: everyboddy that writes expects tew be wize or witty—so duz evrybody expect tew be saved when they die; but thare is good reason tew beleave that the goats hereafter will be in the majority, just as the sheep are here.

Don't forgit one thing: yu hav got tew be wize before you kan be witty; and don't forgit two things: a single paragraff haz made sum men immortal, while a volume haz bin wuss than a pile-driver tew others—but what would Amerikans dew if it want for their sensashuns?

Sumthing new, sumthing startling iz necessary for us az a people, and it don't make mutch matter what it iz—a huge defalkashun—a red elephant—or Jersee clams with pearls in them will answer if nothing better offers.

Signs of Cold Weather.

Punch notes the following signs of a cold snap. It is probably sharp winter weather:

When you think that you don't know whether the first bell has been rung or not.

When it strikes you that your watch is at least ten minutes fast; and so if you get up when the minute hand is "at a quarter to" you'll be in capital time.

That if you could only be taken out of bed to be washed and dressed in a second by machinery, you would'nt mind getting up.

That another five minutes sleep will make you all right for the day.

That it's three minutes to the half hour, and you'll get up exactly at the half hour.

That it's just one minute past the half hour, so you'll get up exactly at the thirty-five minutes.

That as five minutes won't make much difference, say, get up at the quarter punctullay.

The following considerations will also lead you to the conclusion that winter has come at last:

That you can't get up without hot water.

That you don't think that the water is quite hot.

That he had better bring a little more water, please; and take care it is quite hot.

That you can't get up until your clothes are all ready for you.

That a little snooze while James is bringing the clothes (and while he fetches some more hot water,) will do you all the good in the world.

That when you do get up, you won't be a second dressing.

That you'll get up in exactly two minutes from now.

That (the two minutes having passed) you'll just settle what you are going to do to-day, and then get up.

That, if that's the first bell, you've plenty of time; and if it's the second, it's no good hurrying up now, as you are late anyhow.

The consideration that is generally required before making a move out of bed, is in itself a pretty sure sign of the presence of winter.

"What, sir!" exclaimed the guest, starting back in real astonishment.

"Why," exclaimed the Professor, "we have a fine alley in our gymnasium, and I would like to go there and roll a string of ten-pins with you."

"Roll ten-pins with you, sir!" exclaimed the alumnus, with a gleam of malicious fun in his eye; "Why sir, I was expelled from the college for rolling ten-pins!"

Execution of Mrs. Grinder.

PITTSBURGH, Jan. 19, 1866.

The tragedy of a week ago was repeated to-day in our city. Martha Grinder, the modern Borgia, against whom a terrible list of murders is charged, perished on the same scaffold from which last Friday Marshal and Frecke dropped into eternity. The murder that sent those wretched men to the gibbet is unparalleled in this region for its horrible, cold-blooded atrocity, but for cruel steadiness of purpose, malignant, unsatiable thirst for life and fiendish refinement of torture, the crime for which Martha Grinder died is unmatched here, and perhaps in the entire country; and, in addition to the one murder for which she was formally arraigned and of which she was convicted, there is an awful array of suspicions, some of which are almost certainties, charged to her account, and her poisonings were so cunning and so elaborate that any one trying to fathom the motives and understand the nature of the woman who could commit such deeds is thoroughly baffled. She seemed to experiment with poison at random, and the entire neighborhood where she resided was filled with victims of her cruel tests; and when she set out in earnest to kill, she did not put her victims by one stroke out of anguish, but tortured them to death by delicate degrees, seeming to take a fiendish delight in their long drawn out sufferings.

PERSONAL HISTORY.

The woman by whom these deeds were committed was at the time of her execution about forty years of age. She was rather delicate and refined in appearance, and a stranger would suppose her to possess actually the character she liked best to assume—that of a pure, saintly woman. She was a Kentuckian, and in her youth was almost entirely neglected. At the age of fourteen she married. Her husband died shortly after, and she married her second husband, George Grinder, who was a laborer in a Louisville coal yard. Six years ago they came to Pittsburgh in indigent circumstances, but after a few months improved their style of living and moved into a wealthy neighborhood. Mrs. Grinder joined the Methodist Church, and made herself universally popular by her display of saintly graces and her unfiring kindness to the sick and distressed.

THE ARREST.

The most unsuspecting have suspicions sometimes, and at last the kindly-disposed neighbors of Mrs. Grinder became suspicious of her. The number of deaths which had taken place in the neighborhood, among those to whom she had access, the violent and uniform symptoms of sickness exhibited by these who associated with her, the invariable change for the better in cases which were removed out of the neighborhood where she had sway, all tended against the woman, and at last Mr. Caruthers, the husband of the last victim to Mrs. Grinder's arts, made an information before Mayor Lowrey, charging the prisoner with murder. On Friday, August 26th, she was arrested and taken before the Mayor. Her arrest and the terrible charge brought against her, caused rapid and fearful developments in the neighborhood where she had lived. The only marvel was how she could so long have carried on her devilish work unsuspected. Everybody now remembered how strange her conduct had been at times; how invariably every one partaking of her hospitality had been seized with symptoms which it was easy enough now to see were produced by poisoning; how strange and terrible had been the deaths of nearly all whom she had nursed in sickness.

TERRIBLE ATROCITIES.

In March, 1865, a brother-in-law of Mrs. Grinder—a wounded soldier—arrived and was kindly nursed. But he died—from poison, it is supposed, administered by Mrs. Grinder.

A few days afterward, a soldier's widow, with a young child, was kindly taken in by Mrs. Grinder, who professed great benevolence and charity. The child died in a few days.

An old lady, named Gallagher, in July received the hospitality of Mrs. Grinder, and found an immediate grave.

Mrs. Grinder's washerwoman in August received a dinner from her benevolent employer, who took great interest in poor people, and nearly died.

A Mr. Smith's family received some soup from the same charitable hand, and the whole family nearly died.

A young Irish girl, named Jane R. Buchanan, was employed by Mrs. Grinder, and died in 1864. Her trunk contained $40 or $50, which the murderess took care of.

The murder for which she was tried and condemned was that of Mrs. Mary Caroline Caruthers. Mrs. Caruthers was a young married woman, only a bride, of great personal beauty, and of most amiable and lovely disposition. She and her young husband commenced housekeeping next to that occupied by Mrs. Grinder, in Gray's alley, Alleghany City. It was understood that Mrs. C.'s father had presented her with $1,000, with which to purchase a home, and that she had the money in the house. On Tuesday, the 27th of June last, Mrs. Caruthers was invited to take tea with Mrs. Grinder, which she did. Shortly after her return home, she was taken with violent purging and vomiting, and became so prostrated that she was confined to her bed. She took a trip to her father's house in New Castle and immediately became better. Her husband, during her absence, was invited to partake of Mrs. Grinder's hospitality and immediately became affected in the same manner as his wife had been. He became rapidly worse and at last in despair of his life, he sent a telegram for his wife to come home. She came in the full bloom of restored health and beauty. Mrs. Grinder was constant in her neighborly offices. Little delicacies and medical preparations were furnished liberally to the sick man by his kind nurse, and Mrs. Caruthers was invited repeatedly to partake of food that Mrs. Grinder had prepared. On the 15th of July Mrs. C. was again taken violently ill. As before, Mrs. Grinder was unremitting in her kind attentions. Every dose of medicine administered was given by her; every delicacy was brought from her cellar, even the ice and the milk used. The stricken family she insisted on taking into her care. The beautiful victim lingered until the 1st of August, when she died, suffering the most intense agony. After the arrest of Mrs. Grinder, the chemical analysis of Mrs. Caruthers' stomach was made by Prof. Otto Wuth, of this city, and large quantities of antimony and arsenic were found. At the inquest held by Coroner Clawson, the verdict returned was death by poison, administered by Martha Grinder.

HER METHOD OF POISONING

was by administering it in small quantities, in tea, coffee, etc. Only enough would be given at a time to produce slight sickness, and, after the victim had become sufficiently convalescent another dose was administered, and thus Mrs. Carothers was for a long time kept in an extremely feeble state of health.

THE TRIAL.

A true bill for murder was found against her, and on the 24th of October the trial commenced. A season of greater excitement never was experienced here than during the days occupied by her trial. Day after day the court room was crowded to suffocation, a large proportion of the crowd being women. The testimony on the trial was of a damning and overwhelming character. Day by day it accumulated against her until it seemed she must sink absolutely crushed under the terrible weight. No ray of light for her could be discovered in all the testimony. It was all against her, and was dreadful in its character. It was told by many witnesses how with tender care she plied her innocent victim at all hours and with unresisting persistency with the food and medicine that contained the fatal poison; how she heard unmoved the terrible cries of agony called forth from Mrs. Caruthers by every new administration of deadly food and medicines; how she repelled with stealthy arts all attempts of other neighbors to do anything in the way of nursing the sick woman; and how when the young bride lay dying at last, torn with thirst and shrieking with agony, the murderess stood out by the gate, laughing and saying, "She'll go now pretty soon." The honest indignation prevailed against her, and if she could have been placed during her trial unguarded in the rotunda of the Court House, I believe she would have been torn limb from limb. Her bearing throughout was the most singular kind. Not a sign of emotion was perceptible in her demeanor. She would come into the court room and leave it with as firm as step and placid face as if she were only going from the dining-room into the kitchen. The most harrowing details of murder she heard unmoved. When Mr. Caruthers, the husband of the murdered woman, was placed upon the stand, and in a voice broken by sobs recounted the horrible sufferings of his dead wife, and the court and jury and assembly were almost overcome with emotion, the only dry eyes in the room were those of Martha Grinder; and when at last the verdict, guilty of murder in the first degree sounded in her ears, she heard it without a sign of emotion, and went back to her cell apparently without trembling in single nerve.

AFTER THE TRIAL.

On the 1st of December her sentence was delivered. She was much overpowered on this occasion, and also when her death warrant was read to her a week later. The latter time she went into violent hysterics. Before the execution and until very recently, the health of Mrs. Grinder has been very miserable. Many have supposed she would die before the day appointed for her execution. She came very near fulfilling these predictions. On two or three occasions the jailor was summoned into her cell, and one night she swallowed strychnine before it was known she had it, and it was only by the most strenuous efforts that her life was saved. Many people supposed her to be a monomaniac. In order that no doubt might be left on the subject, a medical commission, consisting of Drs. Irwin, Reed and King, was ordered to examine her mental condition on Wednesday last. They reported that no sign of insanity could be discovered, and accordingly her execution was ordered to proceed.

SPIRITUAL ADVISERS.

For the past few days she has been assiduously praying for death. Her spiritual counsellors, the Rev. Dr

Advertisements unaccompanied with directions for the number of insertions, will be continued until ordered out, and charged accordingly. Business cards of five lines, or less, inserted on 3.50 per year.

☞ Work neatly executed at this office. Charges reasonable

☞ There are some of our subscribers who have never paid us a cent since we commenced publishing the 'Herald. To those we would say, we must have our money or we shall place the accounts in an officers hands for collection immediately. A word to the wise is sufficient.

☞ Dr. Curtis is selling the best quality of Groceries a little cheaper than anybody else in town. Best Rio Coffee for 35c.; Sugars and Teas equally low and everything else to correspond.

☞ Go to C H. Adam & Co's. for your Balmoral skirts and Blanket shawls.

☞ The Resolution for debate at the Lyceum on Monday evening next is as follows: Resolved that the rate of interest be established by law.

VALENTINES.—The largest stock in town at J D. Robin's. All fresh, and nary an old one.

DULL.—There has been a great dearth of items of local interest for the past week Peace and quiet appears to reign supreme.

☞ THE LADIES FRIEND for February opens with a touching steel engraving, entitled "News from the War." Its fashion plates are excellent, and its reading matter evinces a good order of talent. This magazine is growing in public favor Address Deacon & Peterson, Philadelphia. Terms $2.50 per year.

☞ A Washington dispatch says the remains of Col. Dwight F. Woodbury, of the 4th Michigan infantry, who was killed at Malvin Hill, July 1st, 1862, have been exhumed by the committee sent from Adrian for the purpose, and are on the way to his former home.

☞ R Barnum of Adrian, late Secretary of the Michigan State Insurance Company, Died on Monday morning last.

☞ There will be a Grand Gift entertainment given at Bidwell's Hall Adrian on Thursday, Feb. 22, 1866, for the benefit of the Lenawee county Soldiers' Monument Fund, under the direction of the officers of the Associotions. $1400 in prise ranging from $130 to $2, to be distributed. Geo. B. Woodford, Adrian Mich.

DRY GOODS.—Now is the time to buy Dry Goods. For bargains go to R. C. Moore's. You will find the largest and best assortment of Dress Goods, Broadcloths, Flannels, Balmoral and Hoop Skirts, Stripes, Tickings &c., in the market. Go where you can get your money's worth.

Special attention is called to the above mentioned stock of goods before you purchase elsewhere.

☞ An exchange truly says that "you may insert a thousand excellent things in a newspaper, and never hear a word of approbation from its readers: but just let a line or two not suited to their taste, slip (though by accident,) and you will be sure to hear of it." There is more trouble to keep a newspaper free from an objectionable thing than filling it twice over.

☞ Among the many fashion Magazines published, perhaps none have taken so high a stand in the appreciation of the ladies, as Madame Demorest's, which is now issued as a monthly. The February number contains a steel plate engraving of a "Birds-eye View of Washington," which seems to be very correct. A colored fashion plate, two pages of music, fashion plates, and life-like patterns, directions, housekeeping affairs, miscellany, &c., are among the attractions.

☞ Go to C. H. Adam & Co's. for your Hoop skirts, Hoods, Clouds, Flannels and Travelling Baskets.

B. F. Taylor's Lecture.

With the lecture of B. F. Taylor, on Friday evening last, closed the season of literary entertainments provided by the officers of the Union Lyceum.

In reviewing the list of lectures with which they have favored us, no one can hesitate to give them great credit for a careful and judicious selection. The thing itself was only an experiment. The Lyceum also lacked the means to secure the best lecturers, now traveling, and even had they possessed the means it would have been of no avail Their aim has been to give our citizens the best course possible with the means at their command, and no one can deny that they have succeeded admirably. The Treasurer informed us that after paying all bills incident to the lectures and receiving three dollars now due the Lyceum there would remain a surplus of just one dollar. The committee has met with some disappointments and with many embarrassments, but little of which no one can appreciate but a man who has had the misfortune to serve on the lecture committee of such an association. The lectures were all good, without a single exception, and some of them were of superior merit, and Taylor's, though last, was by no means least. His gift of language is wonderful, his power of illustration is unsurpassed, and he possesses a poetical taste of the most refined and superior caste. We hazard nothing in stating that he furnished the best illustration of the power of words to paint vivid pictures, and of the force, effect, and beauty of language of any man perhaps that ever appeared before a Tecumseh audience. We trust that the plan of a course of winter lectures, so happily inaugurated by the Lyceum, last fall, will be followed up in future years, for we know of nothing else that affords the community so much substantial and profitable amusement at so slight an expense.

A NEW HISTORY.—Histories of the War are becoming as plenty as toads after a thunder shower, and with the number to choose from no one should growl if he fails to secure the best. The New York House of Appleton & Co., have just published a work written by J. W. Tenny, Editor of the American Annual Cyclopedia, which we consider to be far ahead of its competitors. It is complete in one volume of over 800 double column pages, with every campaign, seige and battle, illustrated by maps and diagrams, the official dispatch and reports of both Union and Confederate generals, a copious index of thirty pages, biographical sketches of all deceased army and navy officers, and many fine steel engravings, and is furnished in six different styles of binding, at prices ranging from five to nine dollars. It contains more than both volumes of Headley's or Greeley's Histories, and is furnished in one volume at nearly half their cost. We predict for it a large sale. Sold only by subscription.

☞ The horse tamer, S. H. Brown, gave his Free Exhibition with his celebrated stallion Draco, on Tuesday afternoon last as "previously announced on the bills." He drove the horse through the street without reins or bridle, making him turn in any direction with perfect ease. After the "show" he gave a short lecture and organized a class to receive instructions in the theory of his art, at the rate of three dollers per head.—Quite a number "went in"—But he failed to learn them anything and he refunded them their money.

BOYS.—The most approved method of raising children now-a-days is to let them run about the street until a late hour as they do in this village—call swearing smartness, blackguardism precociousness, and every species af malicious mischief fun. The pupils of these night schools hardly ever fail to graduate in the penetentiary, and not a few take the higher or gallows degree. A boy who is allowed by over indulgent parents to run about at all hours of the night, will never amount to anything, and will be very likely to come to some bad end.

☞ The Donation visit for the benefit of the Rev. S. E. Wishart on Thursday evening last, was—in the language of the newspaper—a decided success. The attendance was large and he received a Donation to the amount of $200 and over. The citizens of Tecumseh are notorious for their liberality. Of the four Donations already given this winter, none have been less than $150, and two of them have exceeded $200. An excellent community for clergymen, we should say.

Sweathaarts and Wives.

Though the ever heaving ocean
Bear us from our forest-land,
Through the rising waves' commotion,
To far and foreign strand:
Still the heart, all space unceding,
Firmly 'gainst our progress strives,
Leaves us and with haste is speeding
To our sweethearts and our wives.

Ye may bind the eagle's pinion,—
Check the deers impetuos course.—
Curb the steed to your dominion,—
Quell the torrent's headlong force,—
But the spirit, fetters spurning
As our proud ship onward drives,
Leaves us, in its joy returning
To our sweethearts and our wives,

Noah's freed and wandering raven
Toward the ark for safety flew
Backward, to the spotless haven,
Springs, at morn the vesper dew.
Thus affection's fond devotion,
Balm and solace of our lives;
Files, the incense, o'er the ocean,
To our sweethearts and our wives.

THE GLASS BLOWERS. — Milligan's favorite troupe of Bohemian Glass Blowers commenced a series of entertainments at Bidwell's Hall on Monday evening last, and have "showed" to full houses every evening since. The glass steam engine called the Monitor, which they have on exhibition is a perfect gem in its line, and by close examination of it, one can "brush up" considerably on natural philosophy without ransacking the library for Well's or Parker. Valuable presents are given away every evening to the holders of the lucky tickets. In short, their entertainments are well worth attending, and we advise every one who has not already gone, to go without delay and see the Glass Blowers.

LENGTHENING DAYS.—The darkest period of the year is past and Old sol, having completed his annual trip Southward, is again on his way to give light and heat to the inhabitants of the North. The thought of earlier dawns and later sunsets, of longer days of approaching Spring and Summer, with their warming and genial temperature, of coming flowers and fruits, all cheer and elevate the feelings, not only of man but of every living creature. A few more weeks of Winter, and the feathered songsters will greet the early opening dawns with their Paradisal notes. To us there is always a charm, as the increasing length of days begin to be observable, in the thought that winter is rapidly passing away and that soon we shall inhale the necter of flowers and blossoms, and have our brows fanned by the mild breezes of Summer instead of being chilled by the keen cutting blasts of a Northern Winter.

☞ C. H. Adam & Co. have just received a full assortment of the latest style of Hoop Skirts, also a new supply of the celebrated Alexander white kid gloves, zephyr worsteds and other goods. In order to make room for a new and full stock of spring and summer goods, they offer their fall and winter goods at cost for cash; and to purchasers of bills of goods of five dollars and over, they give a chance to draw a prize besides. They cannot be beat in selling goods cheap for cash.

A. CARD.

Having sold out my entire interest in the Photograph Business in the village of Tecumseh, I herewith return my thanks for the very liberal patronage bestowed upon me in times past, hoping for a continuance of the same to my successors W. K. Powers & Co. All old negatives are in their possession and new prints can be procured from them at any time by calling at their gallery over the Post Office. A. J. HOAG.

SOMETHING NEW.—We call attention to the advertisement of the Duplex Elliptic or double Spring Skirt. Though a recent invention, it has become very popular, and is rapidly obtaining the preference over other kinds in use. The rods in it are composed each of two delicate and well tempered springs which are ingeniously braid'd together edge edge, the lower rod heavier, and having a double covering. This peculiarity of construction makes this skirt very strong and durable, and also so exceedingly flexible that it rapidly adapts itself to the form of the wearer, and allows of any amount of doubling and crushing without injury to its shape. These skirts are unquestionably the lightest, most desirable, comfortable and economical ever made These are advantages which ladies, who have experienced the discomfort and inconvenience of single springs, will duly appreciate.

☞ The shipments of apples from this county last fall were as follows:

Adrian station	26,479	bbls.
Tecumseh "	12,510	"
Hudson "	11,500	"
Blisfield "	6,256	"
Clinton "	4,570	"
Clayton "	1,8[illegible]6	"
Deerfield "	1,3[illegible]0	"
Palyra "	1,0[illegible]0	"

A total of 65,501 barrels. Beside these 3,000 barrels are now awaiting shipment from Adrian.

SOLDIERS.—Soldiers who have served in the armies of the Union, children, mothers, everybody that has got a bad Cold, Croup, Whooping Cough, or is troubled with any lung or throat complaints, we advise you to use Coe's Cough Balsam, the cheapest and best cough preparation in the world.

And when you have the Dyspepsia, or are troubled with Constipation—the great cause of ill health—or any trouble of the stomach or bowels, use Coe's Dyspepsia Cure immediately.

☞ The pork season is mostly over. Our buyers have been fully alive to the interests of the farmers, as we judge from the prices they paid compared with quotations at other places.

A LARGE BUSINESS.—During the year 1865 the Old Phœnix Insurance Co. of Hartford issued 47,296 policies covering property to the amount of $60,577-851,00 and paid for fire losses exclusively, the sum of $410,613.51. The Phœnix is now the leading fire company in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Missouri, Tennessee, Mississippi, California and Oregon, and ranks as second only in Michigan. Insure with the Phœnix.—

S. C. STACY, Agent.

C. H. Adam & Co have just received a large stock of sheetings, which they will sell cheaper than they can be bought elsewhere.

☞ Please observe that R. C. Moore has a large lot of sheetings—selling now at lower prices than they are worth in New York;—all cotton goods proportionally low. Moore's is now the place to buy goods.

If you want any Furs—go to Moore's.
If you want Cottons—go, by all means

NEW SKIRT FOR 1866.

THE GREAT INVENTION OF THE AGE IN

HOOP SKIRTS.

J. W. BRADLEY'S New Patent DUPLEX ELLIPTIC (or double) SPRING SKIRT.

This invention consists of Duplex (or two) Elliptic Pure Refined Steel Springs, ingeniously braided tightly and firmly together, edge to edge, making the toughest, most flexible elastic and durable Spring ever used. They seldom bend or break, like the Single Springs, and consequently preserve their perfect and beautiful shape more than twice as long as any Single Spring Skirt that ever has or can be made.

The wonderful flexibility and great comfort and pleasure to any Lady wearing the Duplex Elliptic Skirt will be experienced particularly in all crowded Assemblies, Operas, Carriages, Railroad Cars, Church Pews, Arm Chairs, for Promenade and House Dress, as the Skirt can be folded when in use to occupy a small place as easily and conveniently as a Silk or Muslin Dress.

A Lady having enjoyed the pleasure, comfort and Great Convenience of wearing the Duplex Elliptic Steel Spring Skirt for a single day will never afterwards willingly dispense with their use For Children, Misses and Young Ladies they are superior to all others.

The Hoops are covered with 2 ply double twisted thread and will wear twice as long as the Single yarn covering which is used on all Single Steel Hoop Skirts. The three bottom rods on every Skirt are also Double Steel, and twice or double covered to prevent the covering from wearing off the rods when dragging down stairs, stone steps, etc., etc. which they are constantly subject to when in use.

All are made of new and elegant Corded Tapes, and are the best quality in every part, giving to the wearer the most graceful and perfect shape possible, and are unquestionably the lightest, most desirable, comfortable and economical Skirt ever made.

WEST' BRADLEY & CARY, PROPRIETORS of the Invention, and SOLE MANUFACTURERS, 97 Chambers, and 79 and 81 Reade streets New York.

The reported intention of Napoleon to withdraw the French troops from Mexico is confirmed by letter received at the State Department. The only condition exacted is neutrality upon the part of the United States. Rumors are prevalent that Napoleon has announced to Maximilian his inability to help him any longer, and that Maximilian has expressed his willingness to abdicate in favor of Iturbide.

Terry, commanding at Richmond, Va., has issued an order forbidding the enforcement of the vagrant law relative to the negroes, recently passed by the Virginia Legislature, upon the ground that it will reduce the negroes to a state of servitude worse than that from which they were recently emancipated.

A despatch from Washington states that, in a conversation between the President and a distinguished Senator, on the 28th, Mr. Johnson expressed doubts as to the propriety of making any further amendments to the Constitution; but said that, if amendments were to be made changing the basis of representation and direct taxation,—which he did not deem at all necessary at present,—he favored making the number of qualified voters the basis of representation and the valuation of property the basis of direct taxation. The President also expressed the opinion that the agitation of the question of suffrage in the District of Columbia was "ill-timed, uncalled for, and calculated to do great harm;" that it would prove the entering wedge to agitation of the subject throughout the States, and, he believed, would result in a war of races, and the certain extermination of the negroes.

—St. George's Church (Rev. Dr. Tyng's) at New York, which was burned down a few weeks ago, is to be rebuilt at once, and in exactly the same style as it was before. All the contracts for the work have been awarded. The furniture of the resuscitated edifice will be of oak, as it was formerly. The walls are still in excellent condition, so that they will not require rebuilding. Already the timbers are being got ready, and when we shall have had warm weather once more the work will be proceeded with, and the church will be ready for worship by next August or September. The cost of reconstruction will be $150,000. In addition to this, the clock in one of the towers will cost $4,800.

—A monstrous wild bear, weighing 880 pounds was lately killed in France.

CONGRESSIONAL.

In the Senate, on the 29th, the bill for the protection of all citizens in their civil rights was discussed,—Mr. Trumbull offering an amendment declaring all citizens of African descent born in the United States to be citizens. Mr. Yates introduced a resolution providing that no State or Territory shall make distinction on account of race or color; and that all citizens, without distinction, shall be protected in the full enjoyment of all their civil and political rights.

In the House, on the 29th, a resolution was adopted commending the President for his refusal to accept the present of a carriage and horses from parties in New York; and declaring that the practice of making presents, to secure appointments or promotion, ought to be prohibited. A resolution declaring that the people demand the trial of Jeff Davis, and his execution if convicted, was laid over. The Committee on the District of Columbia was instructed to report a bill excluding rebels from the elective franchise. The constitutional amendment relative to the basis of representation was discussed,—Mr. Raymond of New York taking ground against the position of Mr. Stevens of Pennsylvania, and denying that the insurgent States are out of the Union. The previous question was ordered on recommitting the amendment to the Committee on Reconstruction; at which point the House adjourned.

The preliminary report of the Revenue Commission is published. The Commission recommend such a revision of the internal revenue system as will lead to the entire exclusion of manufactuies from taxation, except liquors, tobacco and possibly a few other articles; a reduction of the tax on distilled spirits to $1 a gallon; a tax of 5 cents per pound on cotton; that taxes should not be paid upon tobacco in the leaf; that the difference in the tax on incomes above and below $5,000 should be abolished; that $1,000 incomes should be excluded from tax, and that no allowance by made for rental, or, at least, not to exceed $300; that the tax on crude petroleum should be abolished the tax on refined being retained; and that the tax on express company receipts should be increased. The Commission estimates the revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, at $367,000,000, and assert that a revenue is possible for that year of $435,000,000.

In the Senate, on the 30th, a resolution was adopted appropriating $10,000 for the expenses of the Reconstruction Committee. The Judiciary Committee reported in favor of Mr. Stockton's right to a seat as Senator from New Jersey. A bill was introduced establishing an active volunteer militia system throughout the United States, to include all able-bodied men between the ages of 20 and 45 years. The bill to protect all persons in the United States in the enjoyment of their civil rights was discussed—Mr. Trumbull withdrawing his amendment offered on the 29th, and substituting the following: "That all persons born in the United States, not subject to any foreign power, are hereby declared citizens of the United States, without distinction of color." No question was taken.

In the House, the Constitutional amendment relative to the basis of representation was recommitted to the Reconstruction Committee without instructions. A resolution to admit the Arkansas Representatives to the privileges of the floor was defeated. Objection was made to the introduction of a resolution declaring that the House would co-operate with the Secretary of the Treasury in bringing the currency of the country to a specie basis. A bill was introduced for a ship canal between the Mississippi river and Lake Michigan.

In the House, Jan. 31, a bill was reported, from the Committee on Commerce repealing all fishing bounties. The Reconstruction Committee reported back the constitutional amendment basing representation upon the number of votes with all reference to direct taxation stricken out,—the measure otherwise being identically the same as when first introduced,—and it was adopted by a vote of 120 to 46. A bill was reported authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell such Marine Hospitals as he may deem advisable.

In the Senate, Feb. 1, a resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on Reconstruction to enquire into the expediency of amending the Constitution so as to declare with greater certainty the power of Congress to inforce and determine by appropriate legislation all the guarantees contained in that instrument. The Committee on Judiciary was instructed into the expediency and constitutionality of extending the jurisdiction of Federal Courts over all suits brought against any persons for acts done done under authority or in aid of the military force of the United States, or under authority of the so called Confederate States. Notice was given that the constitutional amendment relative to the basis of representation would be called up on the 5th inst. the bill to protect all citizens in their civil right was discussed and an amendment adopted—31 to 10—declaring that all persons born in the United States, not subject to foreign power, except Indians not taxed, are citizens of the United States, distinction on account of color.

In the House, Feb. 1, the bill providing that no American vessel sailing under foreign protection during the rebellion shall be entitled to the rights and privileges of American vessels, unless by act of Congress, was passed. The Committee on Agriculture reported back the resolution instructing inquiry into the expediency of graduating the fares charged by railroad companies for the transportation of passengers and freight, and it was referred to the Committe of Ways and Means. Committee had not yet acted upon the report of the Revenue Commission.

In the Senate, on the 2d, Mr. Sumner introduced a joint resolution to carry out the constitutional guarantee of a republican form of government, and to enforce the constitutional amendment prohibiting slavery. The bill authorizing the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit was passed. Mr. Trumbull's bill for the protection of all persons in the enjoyment of their civil rights was passed by a vote of 33 to 12.

In the House, on the 2d, inquiry was instructed into the expediency of extending the same aid to the Iowa branch of the Pacific railroad as to the Kansas branch. Gens. Meade and Thomas paid a visit to the House, and met with a cordial reception.

On the 2d, the President sent a message to Congress stating that, in view of the fact that the commercial interests of the country would be promoted by a formal recognition of the Dominican Republic, he had nominated to the Senate, to represent the United States in that country, an officer of the same grade with the one now accredited to the Republic of Hayti.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

At the time of the recent explosion of a "Pharoah Serpent" manufactory in London, two customers were entering the room. One was blown out of the window, and the other was found dead in the room. Rather a warm reception.

A defalcation has come to light in the Sub-Treasury at San Francisco, the amount being $30,000. The defaulter is a brother-in-law of the Sub-Treasurer.

At Hartford, Jan. 31, the jury in the case of Albert Starkweather, on trial for the murder of his mother and sister, found a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree.

The town of Elmore, on the Cleveland & Toledo Railroad, eighteen miles east of Toledo, was visited by a destructive fire on Saturday night, the 27th ult., when six buildings in the business part of the town were totally destroyed. The total loss is fully $60,000—insured for about half.

The Buffalo papers have a thrilling account of a night-ride on a mice cake down the Niagara River of two men, who had started from the Canada shore for Black Rock in a small boat, (with a companion who was drowned when the boat first struck the floating ice,) and who saved themselves by getting on large cakes of ice. They were over two hours on the ice, and were only rescued when they reached Grand Island, seven miles above the Falls. If they had passed that point, they would inevitably have gone over the Falls. They had drifted seven miles in this terrible manner, and were frozen almost solid when brought to shore.

The steamer Belfast was captured recently by a band of guerillas on the Tombigbee river and her entire freight of cotton stolen.

A man named Lyon was recently frozen to death in Meridian, Miss. The "sunny south" is not all sunshine.

During the late severe storm in Minnesota, a young man engaged in teaching school in the town of Viola, Olmstead county, started from the school-house to his boarding place, a distance of about six miles. He did not arrive home that night, and in the morning inquiry for him resulted in the discovery of his body, frozen stiff, leaning in an easy attitude against a fence, in sight of a house, within a mile of home.

Mrs. Ruth Clark, aged 86 years fell down stairs in her house in New Bedford, Mass., last week and broke her neck

A woman went into a house at Boston, the other day with an infant in her arms, and asked leave to stay awhile, as she was weak and tired. She also asked for something stimulating, saying that she had recently been confined. The lady of the house went out to get a glass of ale for the stranger, and, on returning, found that her own infant, which she left asleep in the cradle, had been taken away by her visitor and a negro baby left in its stead. Nothing has been heard of the woman since, and the affair creates great excitement among the interested party.

In the late severe weather David H. Pertler, of Meeker county, Minn., had his feet frozen, and after the frost was taken out by immersing them in cold water, kerosene was applied for about a week, when he died. Under the penetrating and weakening qualities of the oil, his strength rapidly failed. Its influence on his mind was singular. He thought the oil would burn him to death, and frequently fancied he could see the flame in the room.

A penitentiary convict who jumped from a train near Cleveland, the other day, was chased by thirty men four miles before he was captured, and then would not give up without a desperate struggle.

GLEANINGS.

—A Miss Randall living near La Crosse, Wis., last week succeeded in poisoning a wolf, the largest of the kind ever taken in that region. The bounty and sale of the hide brought her $12.

—The Houston papers are now receiving telegraphic despatches direct from Washington and New York, through Vicksburg and Shreveport—the first in the history of Texas journalism.

—Different sounds travel with different degrees of velocity. A call to dinner will run over a 10 acre lot in a minute and a half, while a summons to work will take from five to ten minutes.

—The John Brown song seems to have been adopted in the British Navy. A serious disturbance recently took place on board Her Majesty's steamer Leander, at Valparaiso, which began by the men refusing to come up when the watches were called, and beginning to shout and yell in chorus, "We'll hang Commander Patten to an old apple tree," etc.

—The Germans at Cincinnati are violently opposed to permitting their countrymen to go South under contract with planters, denouncing such contracts as a species of slavery. Some forty such laborers were coaxed off from the depot there the other day. Col. Lee, late of Joe Johston's staff, has engaged ninety Germans in New York for his Arkansas plantation, but he finds it a mixed question whether he can get them through Cincinnati, though their passage is paid to Memphis.

—There isn't a single printer confined in any of the N. Y. State prisons. What a good lot they must be! This is particularly striking, considering the number of devils employed.

—Notwithstanding the expenses of the war, the State debt of Pennsylvania is nearly $500,000 less than it was five years ago.

—There are two daily papers at Denver and two more in the mountain region.

—The Massachusetts Legislature has fully recognized the right of a woman regularly ordained in the ministry, to legally solemnize marriage.

—The Salt Lake Vidette says that "funny freaks occur in Utah." A short time since a Mormon was frozen between two wives. It turns out he was engaged in hauling wood between the respective cabins of his first and second wives.

—The population of Topeka, the State capital of Kansas, and the present terminus of the Pacific Railroad, is from 2,300 to 2,500.

—The Lawrence, Pa., Journal confirms the truth of the story in reference to finding of the young girl, Louisa Black, in a hay-stack on the farm of Wm. Cornelius, in Lawrence county where she had remained without food for twenty-three days. When found she was in a dying condition from starvation and exposure—both feet were badly frozen. Her physician found it necessary to amputate both feet, and the Journal says when last heard from she was still living, but it is very doubtful if she recovers.

—The Tunisian and Siamese Ambassdors had hardly left France, when those of Morocco made their appearance at the Tuileries, to present to the Emperor six Arab horses and a tiger, as gifts of his Majesty's ally in the Barbary States.

—Mr. Wm. Hatton, a young man residing in Shippensburgh, Pa., one day last week vomited a live snake, about 18 inches long and more than half an inch thick! He swallowed it while drinking from a pool in Idaho about four months since, and has suffered great distress in his stomach ever since, complaining especially of a sensation of coldness.

—The Temps of Paris says:—"Bullfights no longer suffice in Spain. A fortnight ago the Plaza de Toros, at Ubida, was the scene of an entirely new kind of representation. An elephant, of the name of Pizarro, fought bravely against two young bulls. Wounded in the trunk, he at first drew back, hesitated, then, seizing one of the bulls by the neck, he sent it rolling away like a ball, and meanwhile, crushed the ribs of the other under his enormous feet. The antique sports are thus again the order of the day. Elephants now. Panthers anon.

—There are several newspapers in Mexico. The Times, edited by Ex-Gov. Allen, of Louisiana, is altogether the best, however. Next comes the Pajaro Verde, published at the capital, and a prominent journal. Printed on dirty white paper, in very narrow columns, it is chiefly occupied with official documents and manifestoes. El Noticioso, published at Vera Cruz, is neatly and legibly printed, and contains considerable news. The Estafette is a journal much quoted. The Ranchero, of Matamoras, is a "real live newspaper," and can whip ten times its weight in wild cats any time.

—Of 600 men mustered out of the 101st Colored Infantry, at Nashville, Tenn., the other day, 450 made contracts to go into the country to work on farms. As each man took with him a family averaging three persons, about 1,800 colored persons left the city within a single day.

—This year Ash Wednesday falls on St. Valentine's day, and Easter Sunday on "all fools' day"—1st of April.

—The name Dubuque should not be written as it sometimes is, with a capital B, it being a simple and not a compound word.

—A stout and healthy couple at Boston have an infant five months old which weighs only three pounds. It weighed twenty-one ounces when it was born.

—The Journal of the Immaculate Conception, at Rome, has hit upon a new dodge to obtain subscribers, offering a months "indulgence," or pardon of all one's sins for thirty days. This inducement is a little ahead of the Paris paper which promises to each new subscriber a fine obituary in case of death.

—An instance is related where kerosene was applied to thirteen horses for the purpose of ridding them of lice. The result was that five out of the thirteen died.

—A Pawtucket man lately accused a woman of larceny, caused her arrest and imprisonment, in the Providence county jail, for two days and nights, and, after her innocence had been fully established, seriously inquired of her counsel if he could not bring an action for damages against her for all the trouble and expense she had put him to.

—There are all sorts of small newspapers in New York, advocating particular interests. Among them are the Cock Tail, the Billiard Cue, the Bowling Alley, the Cock Pit, and the Rat Terrier. Even the bagnios of the city have their advertising mediums.

SUCCESS OF WESTERN ENTERPRISE.—Children and parents everywhere are rejoicing over the success of The Little Corporal, the brilliant new paper for children published in Chicago, Ill., by Alfred L. Sewell. From the far-off shores of Maine comes the following: "Bright, sparkling and pure; a gem both in typography and contents. Certainly we have seen nothing in the shape of a child's paper which can compare with this, which comes to us from over the prairies."—Portland Daily Press.

The price is only one dollar a year, and certainly The Little Corporal for one year will do the children more good than a quarter's schooling.

How to Keep a Hotel.

Having travelled considerably in my time, I have thought some brief suggestions, short perhaps of a perfect manual on the subject, might be useful.

First, don't call it a tavern, or an inn, or a hotel even.

Call it a House, and name it after some great capitalist, big Indian, or Saint—"Morton-Peto House," or "Whoop-de-Doodle House," or "St. Bob-o-Link House;" that sounds well, and will take the traveller's ear.

Nothing is so vulgar as to court bagmen's and traders' custom, as you will seem to do by naming your establishment "Merchant's," or "City," or "Commercial."

These suggest a second class affair at once.

Be sure and establish an immense barber's shop on the ground floor.

It causes a grateful odor of the Balm of a Thousand Flowers and Night Blooming Cereus to pervade the atmosphere, and effectually subdues and overcomes other and less agreeable smells, as for instance cockroaches and cookery.

If you can hire an Irishman cheap enough, let one man do nothing but swab the marble hall with greasy water all day long; it conveys an idea of cleanliness to the guest at night, when few are about, it is of little consequence.

I said "guests," and here is a point you should by no means neglect.

Be careful in speaking of your lodgers, in printed notices and the like, to use that term.

It is refined, and puts them on their good behavior at once.

Procure a well-dressed clerk with curly black hair, if possible, to stand at the desk, and by all means insist on his wearing diamonds.

Seedy visitors will take no liberties with such a man.

When a traveller comes in, he is not to notice him for the space of five minutes at least; it puts the obligation at once where it belongs.

You may take him in, not he you.

It is an excellent device to have the numbers of your chambers reversed from the old plan, i. e., let them begin to count from the roof.

Thus when a guest sees the clerk put "No. 10," for instance, opposite his name on the register, he departs satisfied, and is too much exhausted and cowed by the time he discovers its whereabouts to make any complaint.

Instruct your clerk that it is not his business to know anything about departing trains and steamboats.

Also, if your House happens to be in a country town, to add $1 a day invariably to all New Yorkers' bills.

They will not think much of your House otherwise.

When a guest has paid his bill and is about to depart, let the clerk ask cheerily, "Which way do you go, Mr. Robinson?"

Some persons are so easily imposed upon, that the extraordinary fact of a highly bedizened clerk's knowing their names two minutes after reading them on the register, tickles them tremendously.

In regard to the dining-room, you cannot have too impudent an Irishman as head waiter.

It should be his duty when a guest enters the room, no matter how empty it may be, to take him in convoy and make him walk the entire length of it before assigning him a seat.

It not only serves to impress the grandeur of the apartment upon him, but invariably disconcerts bashful men, so that they devour their meals meekly and make no troublesome requests.

Ladies should be served in the same way for exactly contrary reasons.

It affords them a good opportunity to display their clothes, and puts them in a good humor.

Let the sexes be kept religiously apart while feeding, unless in case of husband and wife.

Married men travelling alone will suffer so much from the dearth of female society, that next time they will probably bring their wives.

It will scarcely be necessary to make any suggestions in regard to extra charges in the bills, as they will naturally occur to the feeblest of landlords.

You should always, however, charge for a fire in winter in every room that has conveniences for it, and if remonstrated with, reply that it is a "rule of the House," and the guest might have had it.

This phrase you will find of immense service on all sorts of occasions.

Let all your employees be particular to style the hotel omnibus a "coach," and a gent's wife his "lady."

These little elegancies cost nothing, and gild the surface of life immensely.

Procure the largest Chinese gong you can find, to awaken your guests in the morning and call them to meals.

They will conclude that your House is a stunning affair.

A negro will probably beat it more thoroughly than a white man.

Also, on the counter in the office, keep an immense hammer-bell.

A judicious clerk will produce a very humbling effect upon a modest guest by striking it rapidly four or five times when he is asking absurd questions.

Follow these suggestions carefully, and you will go far to prove the truth of Emerson's aphorism that "travel is the fool's paradise."

ROBINSON.

A LARGE cotton factory is to be built at Minneapolis, Minn., the coming season. Gen. C. C. Washburne, of LaCrosse is the leading spirit in the enterprise.

THE German critics say that Vieuxtemps, the violinist, now under Ullman's management, has almost entirely lost the strength of his arm, and that he cannot replace this defect by any more of his brilliant technical achievements.

Travelers Accident Insurance Co. of Hartford.

The necessity of an institution of this character had long been felt by the American public before this company, which like every good thing, has been followed by various less responsible initators, reduced the risk of accident to the matter of a science, and added another most beneficent enterprise to the philanthropic institutions of the country. How often are cases brought to our notice where families, which have long lived, perhaps plainly, but comfortably at least, where all were well fed and well clad, where the children were kept at school, where comfort prevailed, and where want was never known and never dreamed of,—how often into such homes has an accident, which disables the father for a few weeeks or months, brought penury and want. A carpenter, while in pursuit of his daily avocation, falls from a scaffold and breaks a limb. Immediately the $18 or $20 per week, which formed his entire income, and himself, ceases; and, before he is able to resume his occupation, his family find it impossible to procure necessary clothing and fuel, and even food; the children are taken from school, and such as are old enough set to work, and the whole family, in a few weeks, is reduced from comfort to wretchedness. Every man, be he laborer, merchant or professional man, whose income depends on his personal exertions, is liable at any time to be deprived of this income by some casualty.

To provide against such misfortune is the object of the Travelers' Insurance company of Hartford. By the payment of a few dollars yearly, a person secures a weekly salary which will support his family, in case of any disabling accident, and in case of death by any casualty, the payment of a sum to his heirs which will save them from poverty and destitution. This company was the first in the United States to insure against accidents, and is now well established and recognized in the east as the most reliable of all similar organizations. Within the past eighteen months it has promptly paid weekly compensation in over seven hundred cases, without contesting a single one.

As the reputation of this Company has extended to the Northwest, and its business in this section has become important, a branch office has been established in Chicago at which all claims for losses may be adjusted without reference to the parent office, thus offering to us the advantage of a reliable and firmly established company without the disadvantages and delays usually incident to policies taken in eastern companies. Gen. Julius White who formerly devoted his attention to multiplying casualties among the rebels, has accepted the charge of this branch office, assisted by Mr. J. Goodwin, Jr., formerly of the Ætna Insurance Company of Hartford. These gentlemen are well known as capable and reliable business men, and especially well versed in matters pertaining to insurance. That they have been willing to accept the management of this office is sufficient assurance that the company merits and that it will obtain success. It is the intention of these gentlemen to establish agencies throughout the northwest so that the advantages of the company may be accessible to all. When we consider the suffering which is so frequently occasioned for the want of such a provision as can easily be made by every man through this company, it seems that it must immediately become popular, well patronized and extensively useful.

A BALLAD OF NANTUCKET.

BY T. B. ALDRICH.

"Where go you, pretty Maggie,
Where go you in the rain?"
"I go to ask the sailors
Who sailed the Spanish main

"If they have seen my Willie,
If he'll come back to me—
It is so sad to have him
A-sailing on the sea."

"O Maggie, pretty Maggie,
Turn back to yonder town:
Your Willie's in the ocean,
A hundred fathoms down!

"His hair is turned to sea-kelp,
His eyes are turned to stones,
And twice two years have knitted
The coral round his bones.

"The blossoms and the clover
Shall bloom and bloom again,
But never shall your lover
Come o'er the Spanish main!"

But Maggie never heeded,
For mournfully said she:
"It is so sad to have him
A-sailing on the sea."

She left me in the darkness:
I heard the sea-gulls screech,
And burly winds were growling
With breakers on the beach.

The bells of old Nantucket,
What touching things they said,
When Maggie lay a-sleeping
With lilies round her head.

The parson preached a sermon,
And prayed and preached again—
But she had gone to Willie
Across the Spanish main!

UNCLE ZEB.

BY MRS. R. H. STODDARD.

Uncle Zeb's monument is under my window in the yard,—its top in a rosebush, and its base on a bed of pinks. The stone cutter brought it on a truck, and with an air of irreverence launched it into its present position. Uncle Zeb ordered the monument the day after he made his will, and left the duty of paying for it to his executors, although he lived long enough afterward to pay for a dozen of the most elaborate workmanship. This monument is a deceptive affair, like most tomb stones; a wreath of hearts ease is carved round the open book on the square of the pedestal, and a column runs up from it, ornamented with the long stems and flowers of the white water-lily. As I hang over the window-ledge, my recollections of Uncle Zeb assume the shape of imps which grin at me through the meshes of the lily-stems, and they slide their elfish finger over the stony leaves of the book, as if they were writing the true story of a life that I alone can read.

My first remembrance of Uncle Zeb dates from an early period of childhood. One day, while I was at my grandfather's I heard a bustle in the front entry, and a noise like that of the dropping of trunks.

Old Lizzy Bowles, an ancient hanger-on of the establishment, told me that my Uncle Zeb had "come in from a voyage," and that I must go into the east room and shake hands with him. I went into the room quietly, and looked out of the window first, where I saw Uncle Zeb's ship, the Dryad, swinging at anchor, a mile down the harbor. I then turned and looked at Uncle Zeb, who was toasting himself by a roaring fire which burned in a Franklin stove.

He was in that condition of roasted helplessness, which a wood fire always engenders in one on a wet, damp day. He strove to mitigate the smart of his shins by continually changing one leg over the other, and he held his baked hands between his crimson face and the fire. He looked at me from behind them a moment, and then reached up to the mantle, and took from it a present which he brought from Liverpool. It was a red and white cow and calf of earthenware, the like of which had never been seen by any juvenile in our primeval village. As he gave it to me he called me a trollop, and said I looked like my mother. Grandmother, who was knitting a blue stocking in a corner remote from the fire, said "Sho, Zeb!"

This was my first interview with my relative, and my last present. I retired to the kitchen, and to old Lizzy, who told me about the cargo of crockery which she said Uncle Zeb was going to sell in New York, and make a fortune by.

Uncle Zeb was then about thirty; he had made several voyages previous to the one I spoke of, and was already well to do. My father was some years younger, and at the beginning of Uncle Zeb's sea life, was a strapping, lounging about home in a round jacket. It sometimes happens in a well regulated family, that one of its members is overlooked; he is never especially noticed by the rest, and his future is not thought of. My father happened to be the ignored one in his family, and to that fact I ascribe the difference between him and his relations. His idiosyncracy got no twist from their sympathy. But my father was in love; boy as he was, he thought of marriage, and the way to live afterward.

The girl he loved was a poor tailoress; in fact, she made his homespun jackets. She was older than her lover, and had made his jackets with equanimity, while he wore them in a tempestuous state of mind.

Grandmother was the Squire's wife; she felt above the poor tailoress. An impartial mind would perhaps have found it difficult to establish the lines of superiority, for grandmother herself sold milk from her kitchen ever day, and did not disdain to keep the milk-score with chalk on her yellow buttery door. The tailoress was very handsome and very resolute. She would wear feathers in her bonnet; and every Sunday she went to church dressed in better taste than anybody beside,—the handsomest Presbyterian of them all. Most of all, grandmother disliked her because my father loved her. And Uncle Zeb had a weakness in that direction; but it was obscured by selfishness, and died out in moral laziness.

Uncle Zeb went his voyages, and my father, who did not know what else to do, went to sea also; not having any help from grandfather, he was obliged, of course, to ship before the mast, and went under the command of Captain Southerd, a neighboring farmer, who planted turnips, and carted wood and hay to market, in the intervals between his voyages. Nearly all the inhabitants of our little town were amphibious. The boys took to the water like spaniels; their first toys were punts, and skiffs, and rafts. The men, when they were not sailors, were ship carpenters. The landowners put their savings into small vessels, which coasted from Maine to Florida, and even went on six months' trips into the Atlantic for whales.

Uncle Zeb and his brother did not meet often. When one was at home the other was generally away. Uncle Zeb bought up the Dryad, piece by piece, and went in her to all the trading ports in the word, from St. Petersburgh to Calcutta. The merchants from whom he purchased his cargoes, or to whom they were consigned, invited him to their houses, and in this way he picked up bits of eccentricity, which he grafted upon his ordinary manners, and made a very strange compound of himself. At home he travestied foreign ways, and introduced unheard of fashions in grandfather's house. He swore beautifully in all languages; but his native damns never left him, any more than his appetite forsook him for salt junk and grog, after he had learned to like what he called foreign kickshaws.

Father plodded along on small wages, and had a remote hope of reaching the cabin. When ashore, he lounged in his round jacket, and kept on loving my mother, who waited in patience for a turn in the long lane of their courtship. She snubbed Uncle Zeb whenever she had a chance, and always inquired about father, of him, by the name of Esop. Grandfather, as well as Uncle Zeb, grew comfortably rich. His investments in sloops and schooners were fortunate ones, and he talked of buying a ship to fit out for a whaler. Feeling the need of a helper, for the first time in his life he turned his attention toward his youngest son, who was then at home, waiting for Captain Southerd to harvest his turnips. A proposal of partnership was made to father, which he accepted; and thus his sea life ended. He was married at once, and he and mother took to housekeeping with one feather-bed, six small silver spoons, and a hearty affection for each other. Father applied himself to business, and the house that was thus founded became in a few years one of the richest and most influential in our part of the country. Grandfather very soon saw that it would only be necessary for him to take his share of the profits, and that he could safely give up all business matters to his partner.

In a year from the date of their marriage I was born, and at the time of Uncle Zeb's arrival from Liverpool with my cow and calf, I was five years old. That voyage was the last one that Uncle Zeb made. Finding us prosperous, he concluded to retire from business. He invested his money outside of the family interest, but considerately took up his abode with grandfather, and indulged grandmother with the care of him. He occupied himself with watching the domestic and business transactions of the house of A. G. & Son, and banking his money as fast as it came in.

For a few years I cannot remember much concerning Uncle Zeb; the traits I recall belong to my present knowledge of him. When I went to school, it was one of my recreations to go to grandfather's to dinner at mid-day, and one of my miseries to sit next to Uncle Zeb at the table. His dog, "Die," squatted on the other side of him. We had to wait till Uncle Zeb was carefully helped, by himself, to all the best bits on the table Then he would give Die a titbit, making her snap her jaws for it, and then one to me A snarling was kept up between him and the dog through the whole meal.

He would not have the potatoes on the table; they must be kept hot on the kitchen fire; so grandmother sat fork in hand, watching him; when he wanted one, she fished it from the kettle, and he ate it scalding hot, with noise. Grandmother occupied a child's high chair, and wore a black satin hood over her high crowned cap. She never dined or supped till after Uncle Zeb; and I had the best of times after he and Die had retired from the table. Grandmother took excellent care of her graceless son. He wore ruffled cambric shirts; and many an afternoon when the sun's rays slanted through the narrow kitchen windows, and made her resemble, in her shining spectacles, an owl, have I seen her laboriously plait his ruffles with a case-knife. On Sundays she combed his hair; it was fine and straight, and of the color of wet sand. It was unchanged to the day of his death. On Sunday afternoon he went to church in a great camlet cloak, and carried a cane with leather tassals. He listened to the sermon with an air of respect, and broke grandmother's heart with deriding it after he got home.

Now and then he had a visiter—some piratical looking captain or foreign merchant; the visitor was never introduced to any of the household, but was entertained in the parlor with tumblers of red wine and equivocal stories. As he never minded whether I came or went, I sometimes had the benefit of the latter. His laughter always arrested me; it contradicted him, it was so racy and hearty. His teeth glittered in his sardonic face, and lighted it up; they were long, white, and regular, and like his hair they never changed.

Two visits per diem were Uncle Zeb's allowance at our house. The first was made an hour or so after dinner, when he loitered in the kitchen, and tickled the servant the servant girls or poked them with his cane. Afterward, with his hat in his hand, he sought mother, and however long his stay, he held his cane and hat as if on a visit of ceremony. He talked well; he was sarcastic and witty, and never bored anybody. The second visit was made after supper, when father was at home. There was no confidence between the brothers, and no sympathy; but they passed cigars to each other, and enveloped themselves in clouds of smoke, and discoursed through it on commonplace subjects.

As soon as I was fledged, I was sent to boarding-school. My vacations were short, and I did not observe what went on at home; things seemed to run smoothly in the grooves of habit. I accepted appearances for realities. The business of A. G. & Son had greatly increased. All the year through, their ships were arriving in port, or were fitting for sea. Our household was a gay one, and grandfather's house was full of comers and goers. He knew little of the private affairs of the concern; but smoked his pipe, and burnt holes with its falling ashes in his fine blue pantaloons, in peace and tranquility. Uncle Zeb had given up ruffled shirts, and had taken to Marryatt's novels. He neither bought nor sold; he never gave advice, or asked an opinion. He had a habit of going to funerals, but he went in a cheerful state of mind, as if the deceased had done him a favor by dying. He was respected as a moneyed man. The world admires what it dare not be a consistent, selfish skeptic; and our little world gave its admiration to my hard-headed Uncle Zeb. He was cautious, because he was cold—prudent, because he was indifferent. As a token of the respect of his townsmen, he was elected representative, and had a seat in the State House for several years. He brought home a great many volumes of revised statutes, which grandmother stored in the garret, with the dried herbs. What he did as a member of the honorable body of representatives nobody knew. He only spoke of the toughness of the pie-crust, and the hardness of his bed at his boarding-house.

When I was eighteen I left school and came home for good. I was the only young woman in the family connection, and was considered worthy of much attention. Uncle Zeb, however, did not like me. He had his way of exasperating me. He always talked as if he knew that I must know that virtue was only a pretence. It was a game we were all playing. It was becoming in a woman to affect modesty; it was her capital. He gave me credit for shrewdness, and he had no doubt but that I should play my cards admirably. If I grew enraged at him, he laughed at me; but sometimes I made his cold blue eyes gleam with anger by telling him one or two unpleasant truths. His manner was usually deferential to women; but his ribaldry would break out now and then, and I have known him to be as course as Rabelais in a room full of ladies. It was done with an air, as if he were obliging us with his candid wit.

It was not long after my return from school that I perceived that something weighed on father's mind. When I accompanied him on his many drives from one business place to another, I saw the mask of cheerfulness drop from his face; he was absent-minded and silent. One day when we were alone, I begged him to tell me what troubled him, and then he owned to me that his business affairs were vexing him; that things had been going behindhand for a year; but I must say nothing of this, for he had hopes of being able to overcome his difficulties. Independent of his business perplexities, the keeping it a secret was a trouble; he dared not retrench any expense, and he feared the effect of the truth on grandfather, who was becoming childish. We went on this way for two years; plan after plan of salvation failed; but father's energy and good temper never left him. One day I thought of Uncle Zeb. "Why won't he," I said to myself "put some of his thousands to the wheel?" I determined to tell him the state of affairs; I did expect much from his generosity, but something from his pride; and thought, too, that his shrewdness might enable him to make something eventually out of any loan he might offer. So I sought him, and found him lying on the floor in the East Room asleep. I roused him, and did not wait for him to open his eyes before I began my tale. When I had finished, he eyed me for a moment, and said:

"So, you'll have to come down. Your devil's pride will be broken."

I stared mutely at him, but inwardly called myself a fool.

"I'll see," he said, "about buying up the family acres when the crash comes; but as for piling my money on the ruins of your father's speculations—that I won't do. Go home; if your father knew this he would pull your ears, though he is idiot enough not to do it."

I rose from my chair, looking, no doubt, just as I felt, for he laughed, and said, "Kick me, if you like."

I went home thoroughly miserable, and did not report my interview, while Uncle Zeb on his part was silent also; but I did much mischief that day, and Uncle Zeb did a good stroke of business out of the capital which I had furnished him.

About this time grandmother was persuaded to take an assistant—one who should unite in herself the qualities of companion and housekeeper. As there exists such a race of females, one was easily found. She was a remote cousin (this race is apt to be distantly related) and lived forty miles away, in grandmother's native place. Her name was Nancy Goring; her age thirty-five. She was poor, intelligent, proud, and adroit. She had pretty, delicate hands, a large nose, and wore her hair parted at the side of her head. Her wardrobe was neat, but scanty; and grandmother, who believed in making people happy as far as good clothes and food went, bought material for dresses and petticoats, and the companion's first duty was to make them up. After the dresses were made, she was allowed to knit and to sweep a little; but grandmother's pride was still too great to allow herself to be supplanted in housekeeping.

Uncle Zeb proposed the position of haircomber to Nancy, as grandmother's eyesight was failing, as whenever she combed his hair now she fell asleep, and made an irregular thing of it. Nancy accepted; and from that time she began to pay him all sorts of delicate attentions, from cutting his finger-nails and tying his cravat, to mixing his grog and looking over his accounts. Uncle Zeb understood Nancy's devotion to him; but Nancy was very uncertain as to the nature of his feelings for her. She was desperately bent on turning Uncle Zeb from the errors of a bachelor into the merits of a husband. She watched him and followed him, and grovelled about him; but all in vain. Uncle Zeb never gave way. One day grandmother's eyes were opened. She found Nancy, with a red silk handkerchief of Uncle Zeb's in her hand, which she had rolled into a tight ball, imprecating its owner hysterically.

The next day Nancy returned to her native place.

Our evil days drew near. A ship—the one father depended on as his last hope—made a broken voyage, and he was obliged to succumb. The house of A. G. & Son failed. A few days before the public announcement of the failure, he told it to his family. Then Uncle Zeb played his part. He behaved as if he had received an insult from father; he glowered with rage, and cursed him for his duplicity and foolishness. How dared he disgrace the name with failure and poverty? Had he given up all his property to his creditors? He himself had taken what measures he could to save some little from the wreck; and then it came out that he had obtained from grandfather every cent of his private property: deeds had been signed by grandfather in Uncle Zeb's favor, merely, as Uncle Zeb had told him, to make him safe if ever a rainy day came along. He had not made any nice distinctions between personal property and that which belonged to the firm, but had clawed into his possession all he could, and left the reputation of it to rest on father, if possible, if the creditors should discover it, and make allowance for it in the settlement.

The failure came out, and our house was besieged from morning till night by creditors. They were the more angry for its being unexpected. They not only wanted their money, but an explanation. Father had his office closed, and staid at home to receive them. The parlor was full of ledgers, and councils were held over them, during which his character and conduct were discussed as if he had not been present. Not being a creditor, Uncle Zeb was denied the pleasure of being a member of the council; but he came and went a dozen times a day, without speaking to one of us. He went about the ship-yards poking the timber with his cane, as if he would like to hurt it, and I saw him on the wharf studying the spars of vessels. He was taking much more exercise than he had been accustomed to, and it evidently did not agree with him.

His ownership in certain properties was denied by the creditors; but they could not prove that the large homestead which had been grandfather's, belonged to the firm; so it passed into Uncle Zeb's keeping. But the creditors increased the per centage of what father was to pay on his debts, in consequence.

So we are ruined. Father made some arrangement by which his parents were not disturbed in their way of living; but mother, and the rest of us, gave up our purple and fine linen. Although Uncle Zeb lived in his own house now, the expenses of living were not defrayed by him, but by A. G. & Son. But if he did not complain, we should? He felt contempt for father; at the same time, I believe he had some admiration for [illegible]

Uncle Zeb's clothes. Her waxed thread was whizzing through them from morning till night. She did not profess to know much, she said, but she would like to see the woman who understood tailoring better. She called Uncle Zeb a "superior being," and talked to him about property; her respect for money was immense. Her manner toward him was full of humility, and if he came near her, she made a feint of retreating, at the same time casting her small eyes upward with an adoring expression. She meekly offered her snuff-box to him whenever she took a pinch, and after a little he fell into the habit of snuffing with her. He employed a portion of his time in experimenting with alcohol. Cloudy tumblers stood on the shelves with curious mixtures in them—a sediment of rhubarb overlaid with brandy, or gin and senna, or pounded Brandreth's pills in Jamaica rum. He had a theory that if physic was taken with a dram it could have no deleterious effect Night and day he drank his compounds. He set his bed on fire; he fell on the dining-table and crashed the dishes; he rolled off his horse with his feet in the stirrup; he laid in the street. But Sally Packer was his providence; she kept harm away from him. She dragged him to bed; she washed him; she dressed him, and she fed him—and he cursed her.

The consequence of his theories was, that one morning he woke up with a paralysis, and father was obliged to take charge of him. Tenderly and mercifully he cared for him, for he was speechless and helpless. Sally Packer hustled him about as if he were a baby. How he wanted to rail at her! His eyes glared and burned with rage whenever he saw father come into his room. One night his watcher was startled from a nap by the sight of Uncle Zeb in the middle of the floor.

"My cursed tongue is loose," he said, "and I can walk. Get out of the way!"

He wrapped the counterpane round his gaunt form, and tottered low-stairs into the street. He leaned against the fence and looked up to the sky and chafed his feeble hands, and then crept back to bed; but from that night he was better, and soon became well.

Grandmother soon followed Grandfather, and slept near him in the same narrow bed. Sally Packer asked leave to remain long enough after the funeral to put the house in order. It was granted, and it took her years to do it—in fact, the house was never in order afterward; and so she staid. She convinced Uncle Zeb that no one could take care of him better than she could. She told him that the selfish world might say she expected to be remembered in his will; but it was not so. She had a good home of her own in Swampscot; a house, which, although it was not plastered, did not leak a drop, and there was as good a well of water close to it as ever was. She was willing to stay just to keep him from being imposed on, although she didn't know but that his relations were as honest as anybody's relations.

No one imposed upon either Uncle Zeb or Sally. The Lares and Penates of the ancient household were broken; its former friends deserted it. It did not agree with Sally Packer's principles to have company; her moral constitution was averse to anything like hospitality. Uncle Zeb was indifferent whether anybody came or went. So Sally kept her ground, and had her own way. Uncle Zeb cursed and ridiculed her every day of her life. She cajoled, and wrangled, and worried, and petted him. Now she complained of being worn out with hard work, and now, that it was a place her betters would be glad to be in.

Both were to be found, usually, in the kitchen of the old mansion, a low-ceiled, dingy room, with a great brick hearth, on which Sally had ranged for convenience a row of pots and kettles. A fire burned, Summer and Winter, on the great iron dogs. Sally's chair was in one corner of the hearth, where she could poke the fire, or stir the contents of the pots and kettles; her snuff-box, and comb, and an almanac, were on the shelf above the fire. Her hair was thick and gray, and she was fond of combing it when she had a leisure moment. She wore short dresses of black bombazine, which never required washing, and went bare-legged; her shoes were made of coarse carpet on account of her corns. Uncle Zeb generally reclined on a wooden settee under the window; an old woollen cloak, rolled up, served him for a pillow. At the foot of the settee, whenever Uncle Zeb reposed on it, lay an ugly dog, which was Sally's property, by name "Spot." Picked bones, the remains of Spot's feasts, were strewed under the table, and under the settee. Spot had a habit of howling in his sleep, and Uncle Zeb had a habit of kicking him for it. As he declined the trouble of taking off his hat when he laid down, it suffered in looks, and resembled a pair of windless bellows. He took snuff lying down; the result to his nails, and beard, and clothes, was deplorable. After Grandmother's death he resumed the habit of dram-drinking, minus the drugs, in the full expectation of killing himself. He began then to fling his money into wild schemes; he would amuse himself with using up as much as he could of his property, he said, before he was summoned to move off for good. He had some trouble, for he would not give it away; so he built and rebuilt inconvenient houses, and drained barren fields, and planted in the sand, and blasted rocks; and made roads that led to nowhere.

Everybody now knew Uncle Zeb's character, and he and Sally were the curiosity and aversion of the neighborhood. The old-house grew darker and more dismal every day. He was continually cutting doors and passages through the walls; he seemed to have an idea that they would enable him to elude some enemy that might come upon him. Sally had all the carpet taken up and put away, and all the beds stripped. She slept on a stuffed bench outside Uncle Zeb's door. All the furniture was piled away; the looking-glasses were covered, and the shutters of every room were fastened. All she wanted for daily use was congregated in the kitchen, and there she staid as if she were waiting for some event to happen.

Once in a while I lifted the latch of the porch door. Sometimes the inmates noticed me, and sometimes not. Now and then Uncle Zeb would sit up on his crumpled hat, and revive with me his recollections of his voyages, and tell me many a piquant and picturesque anecdote. Sally would also forget herself a moment, and listen with admiring "Laws, Capen Zeb." But oftener I was the silent witness of angry disputes, when she stunned me with her foolishness, and he pained me with his profanity. His common salutation to her was, "You lying jade," whereat she whimpered or scolded, according to the mood of the moment.

Father remonstrated with him once, but Uncle Zeb drove him away. He made his will soon afterward, and ordered the monument of which I have spoken; but his constitution was an iron one, and it bore much before he had a second stroke of paralysis. When he did, his cause was at once hopeless, and father again took the post of an only friend. Sally was at her wit's end. She threw the medicine out of the window, and whispered about poison. She talked and cried over him, till father was obliged to turn her from the room.

The night he died, father staid by his bed-side. About one o'clock Uncle Zeb turned over, the first time he had moved since the stroke. His fingers trembled toward father's. The first kindly look he ever gave his brother, beamed in his wild eyes then. Faint broken words struggled on his lips; but it was too late for speech—"Your wife, Mary," was all he said,—so he went out of this world, an unhappy mutilated spirit.

The homestead reverted to father; but it stands empty. The doors and passages which Uncle Zeb cut are open; and the beds that Sally stripped, still stand bare. No one has been there since the day of the funeral.

The house was crammed from cellar to garret with such articles, a space large enough for a sofa, upon which to sleep, being retained upon the first floor.

Gen. Henry H. Sibley, (says the St. Paul Press,) has determined to remove permanently to New York City, having already made arrangements to embark in business there. Gen. Sibley has spent his whole life in the Northwest, beginning as an Indian trader. He was the first Delegate to Congress from Minnesota, 1849-53, the first Governor of the State, 1857-59. Since the spring of 1863 he has been in the military service, conducting expeditions against hostile Indians.

Frederick Hudson, Esq., the well-known managing editor of the New York Herald, has been compelled at last by his gradually failing health, to relinquish the position he has held for many years. He has received a leave of absence for two years, and will spend the time in traveling, as the state of his health may warrant. It may be mentioned to the credit of Mr. Bennett, that he did not part with the man who has served him so faithfully, without placing in his hand a check for the full amount of the salary which he would have received had he continued at his desk.

The Mexican "Empress" and suite turned out in rather laughable state at Vera Cruz upon her return from Yucatan. It is said the carriage would have done discredit to the livery stable of a "one-horse" town. She was received very coldly by the people.

The Rev. Col. Granville Moody, well known in the military as well as the theological world, preached two sermons on Sunday, the 21st, at the Methodist Episcopal church in Washington, and raised $10,000 for the completion of the church. Among his hearers in the morning was President Johnson, who was a friend of Col. Moody in the darkest days of the rebellion in Tennessee. When the contributions were being taken up, the President emptied his pocket-book into the basket, and urged them to take it. His contribution was about $100. At the conclusion of the morning services, President Johnson was elected a life-member of the society, and the fee of $1,000 and $300 beside, was immediately subscribed by the congregation.

J. Ross Browne, the distinguished American traveller, has just been appointed captain of Arizona volunteers, and ordered to headquarters in San Francisco for topographical duty. He will start to Arizona soon. Ross Browne owns a delightful residence in the town of Oakland, across the bay from San Francisco, and has an interesting family. His home is surrounded by the rarest of shrubbery, and all the flowers that grow in our climate bloom in his garden. I had the pleasure of calling on him at his residence, and found him one of the most agreeable gentlemen I ever met. He gossiped about his travels in various quarters of the globe, and said that he started from home on his first trip with but fifteen cents in his pocket, traveled 12,000 miles, and returned with more money than he had when he started. He also told me that he went to Germany on one occasion, taking his family with him. He arrived in London with barely money enough to carry him to his destination. He resided there three years, and returned again to his native land. He said the captain of the steamer had to carry him on his return to New York on credit. He supported himself all the time he was in Germany by his pen, writing for Harper's Magazine, the Sacramento Union of this State, and other journals. He told me that he had never made much money publishing books. The Harpers, he said, always preferred publishing his magazine articles before printing his books. The price usually paid him by the Harpers for a magazine paper was $250. I was in company with the proprietor of a literary journal of the city at the time I made the visit, and, during all the time we remained at his house, he talked to us about his travels and literary labors. He is a man of great energy, and is imbued with the progressive spirit of the age.—Ex. Cor.

Make the Most of Yourself.

Some time ago I was traveling in the cars, and soon after I took my seat a lady entered accompanied by a young lad apparently ten or twelve years old. The cars were not then crowded, and I didn't think it at all strange when she turned over a seat and gave it to her son, and took the opposite one facing him herself.

Plenty of room is always very desirable, and to take it, not at all selfish, unless, as often happens, the world we live in gets crowded! so I looked at the lady without any wish to criticise or find fault.

But pretty soon the car began to fill up. Men came in looking about anxiously for ladies, and one pale, and sick looking man had to stand up until I offered my seat. I looked at this woman and her son in perfect astonishment. She'll surely take up her satchel, I thought, and tell her son to take a seat by her side, and make room for two on his seat, but there sat the woman as quietly as if every body were comfortably seated, and there lay her satchel by her side, there on the opposite seat sat "sonny," with no thought of being disturbed.

I expected every minute to see the mother give up one of the seats, and, to my perfect surprise, heard her at last say—

"Stretch out and make the most of yourself, sonny, or you'll have to divide your seat with that old woman."

I looked up and saw the conductor casting his eyes about to find a seat for an old lady he had brought into the cars.

I should have given her my seat without any delay, but I was curious to see what the mother and son would do. That the boy would finally resign his seat, I supposed as a matter of course, but I was quickly convinced that nothing was further from his intention, for he stretched out and made the most of himself, according to direction.

The conductor at last spied him, and taking him by the arm, as if to raise him up, said, "Well, young man, I must disturb your nap."

Then turning to the mother, he said, "Madam, will you please take up your satchel and give this boy a seat by you? I want to turn over this seat and give it to this lady."

The boy resigned his seat, but evidently was very much out of humor. "I was all fixed, and you might have left me alone," he said in an undertone.

"I saw you were all fixed," replied the conductor with a smile, "but I found it necessary to disturb you.—You ought to have known better than to take a whole seat when the cars are full. I shall know you the next time I see you, young man."

Nothing more was said. The mother was too indignant to speak, and the boy had said all he dared to say.

I left the cars, thinking, with the conductor, that I should know the boy the next time I saw him.

It was a sad picture of selfishness, and it pained as well as disgusted me. There was a boy beginning his life by acting out selfishness, and seeking his own comfort, to the great discomfort of others.—Presbyterian Banner

ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

ITS IMPORTANCE.

Every man is liable to accident, no matter what his occupation or pursuits, whether he travels much or none at all; whether he works amid the whirr and clatter of moving machinery, or in a store, lawyer's office, or editor's sanctum. The liability is, of course, not equal in all cases—yet statistics and newspaper files give plenty of illustrations of careful, sedentary men, who are killed or seriously injured by some one of the common accidents of daily life, while other men may drive a railroad train or run a planing machine for a score of years without a scratch.

THE PIONEER COMPANY.

The Travelers' Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn. was the first to successfully introduce the practice of accident insurance in this country. Its founder was James G. Batterson, Esq., of Hartford, Conn., who has witnessed the workings of accident insurance in England. A charter was obtained from the Connecticut Legislature of 1863, contemplating only the insuring of railway passengers and other travelers. In the spring of '64, an amendment to the charter was obtained, authorizing insurance against accidents of all kinds, and the company issued its first policy April 1, 1864.

CHARACTER AND STABILITY OF THE COMP'Y.

It has a paid up cash capital of half a million, and, on the 1st of December, its net surplus was $85,838.12. The capital and assets are prudently invested in good securities, that can be turned to cash at one day's notice, to meet any sudden and sweeping losses. Within a year and a half it has paid promptly and satisfactorily, over $90,000 in losses, to between SEVEN AND EIGHT HUNDRED policy holders, in sums ranging from five dollars to ten thousand dollars.

ACCIDENTS INSURED AGAINST.

This company insures against the following casualties: All forms of dislocations, broken bones, ruptured tendons, sprains, concussions, crushings, bruises, cuts, stabs, gun-shot wounds, burns and scalds, bites of mad dogs or serpents, unprovoked assault by burglars, robbers murderers, etc., the action of lightning or sunstroke, the effect of explosions, chemicals, floods, earthquakes, suffocation by drowning or choking, when such accidental injury is the cause of death to the insured, or of total disability to follow his usual avocation.

We may say, in general terms, the Travelers' insures against every possible form of casualty to life and limb—everything except disease.

GENERAL ACCIDENT POLICIES.

A general accident policy insures against accidents of all kinds, and at all times and places, whether traveling or not, at home or abroad, whether working in shops, offices, mills, factories, at any of the trades, or on the farm; whether riding, walking, hunting, boating, skating, swimming, or editing a daily newspaper. This is the kind of policy we recommend to all our patrons. They are usually issued for terms of one year, but may be had for one month, three months, three years, or five years.

These policies furnish a complete protective insurance, everywhere and at all times.

An insurance ticket for $3,000 and $15 a week compensation, insuring only "against injuries caused by accident to the policy conveyance," costs two dollars for a month; while a monthly policy covering the same amount of insurance, precisely, but insuring against all kinds of accidents, whether traveling or not, costs three dollars. Is it not worth more than the extra cost?

NO MEDICAL EXAMINATION REQUIRED.

All ages are taken, except children. The state of health is not inquired into; but a policy will be issued at five minutes' notice.

PARTIAL LIST OF LOSSES BY DEATH PAID

Stephen Super, a railroad conductor of Peoria, Ill. was killed by falling between the cars, in December 1864. He was insured in the Travellers' of Hartford for $5,000, about four weeks previously, and the money was at once paid to his widow. This was the first total loss sustained by the company.

Horace Frederick Merwin, express messenger of Atchison, Kansas—his parents reside in Brooklyn, N. Y.—was shot by a Cheyenne Indian, Nov. 19, while crossing the Plains by the regular stage line, and instantly killed. He was insured for $10,000, and the money was paid to his mother within two days after proofs of his death were received.

John F. Cunningham, manufacturer, of Sing Sing, N. Y., was one of the ill-fated victims of the dreadful explosion on the steamer St. John, at New York, on Sunday morning, October 29th. Himself and all his family were scalded—the mother and one daughter are recovering, the father and one daughter died from their injuries some time after the accident. Mr. Cunningham was insured for $5,000, which sum was promptly paid to his widow.

Dr. C. G. M. Griffiths, a physician, of Delaware Co. Pa., on his return home from Baltimore one dark and stormy night in September last, with a large sum of money on his person, was waylaid, murdered and robbed, as he left the train at the station nearest his home. He was insured for $10,000, and the money has been paid to his widow.

Thomas B. Bostwick, farmer, of Ravenna, O., while at work in a well upon his farm, August 1st, was killed by a stone falling upon his head. Insured for $2,000, which has been paid.

John B. Preston, merchant, of St. Louis, was accidentally drowned at Lockport, Ill., on the night of April 17th, while on a visit to his father. Insured for $5,000, which amount has been paid.

Henry C. Thompson, painter, of Morrisville, N. Y. fell from a wagon and was killed, September 14th. Insured for $2,000, which amount was at once paid to his widow and children.

J. G. Anthony, farmer, of Buffalo, West Va., killed by a fall from a building, in October last. Insured for $1,000, which has been paid to the lady for whose benefit the policy was written.

Chas. J. Creditor, student, of Fort Wayne, Ind., had his arms blown off in firing a salute on Inauguration Day, March 4th, and died four weeks after the accident. Insured for $2,000, which was promptly paid.

Anson Casler, livery keeper, of Little Falls, N. Y., was murdered and his body thrown into the canal, on the night of September 18th. Insured for $1,000, which was paid to his young widow.

Mr. Minor, merchant, of New Britain, Conn., killed by a sunstroke in the West Indies, last May. Insured for $1,000, and the money was paid to his family.

A gentleman of New Haven, lost at sea in March, '65, His wife was paid $1,000 by the Travellers'.

Daniel H. Wells, insurance agent, of Defiance, Ohio; death caused by a violent contusion on the cords of his neck, while carrying a ladder, Oct. 2d. Insured for $1,000, which was paid.

G. B. Hicks, painter, of Northampton, broke through the ice and was drowned, December 14th, while crossing Chippeway Creek, St. Lawrence county, N. Y. Insured for $1,000 only two weeks previously (Policy No. 60,598), and the money will be paid to his children.

WEEKLY COMPENSATION.

An important consideration, which commends accident insurance to public favor, is its system of weekly compensation. Under an ordinary life policy, the person whose life is insured can never reap any personal benefit from the sum assured; it goes to his family or heirs after his death. But any person insured in the Travelers' who is injured by any accident whatever so severely as to temporarily disable him from attending to his business, can receive insurance at once, and have the consolation of drawing his fifteen or twenty dollars per week toward paying doctors' bills and family expenses.

OVER SEVEN HUNDRED COMPENSATION LOSSES PAID.

On the books of the company are recorded over seven hundred cases of weekly compensation losses, paid within the past eighteen months, for non-fatal injuries. These losses have without a single exception been paid promptly without contesting one, and with perfect satisfaction to the policy holder. The receipts for each of these losses are on file. They vary in amount from $5 to $650 each, and embrace men of all professions, trades and occupations; rich men and poor men; men in all States of the Union; and include the greatest variety of common or unusual accidents ever collected in this country.

A large number of these weekly compensation losses were paid to citizens of the Northwest; and the living witnesses to the prompt and fair manner in which these losses were adjusted and paid, may be found in many Western cities and towns.

THE CHEAPEST PROTECTIVE INSURANCE.

A general accident policy in the Travelers' is believed to be the cheapest form of protective insurance extant. It covers a larger risk in proportion to the amount of premium than any other class of insurance, is within the means of nearly every man, and the hundreds who have experienced its benefits can testify to its actual value.

An annual premium of ten to twelve dollars, according to occupation, will secure a policy for two thousand dollars in case of fatal accident, or ten dollars per week in case of disabling bodily injury—the compensation to be paid so long as the person is disabled from attending to his usual business, not to exceed twenty-one weeks for any one accident.

Any other sum, from $500 up to $10,000, at proportionate rates. Risks that are specially hazardous will be charged hazardous rates.

HAIR RENEWER,

As the name indicates, not only RENEWS the growth of the hair when thin and falling off, but positively renews the color to its original shade when it is turning grey or white, whether caused by disease, grief or old age.

It will certainly do what is claimed for it, a fact to which hundreds, nay thousands, who have used it, are ready and willing to testify Where one bottle is fairly used, in any community, its reputation "spreads like wild fire," and is the best advertisement and recommendation we desire. In the Eastern States, where the "RENEWER" originated, the young ladies use it as a hair dressing; it is found on the toilet tables of young men, (also at their barbers), while older men and women who desire a Renewer and Restorative for their grey locks and bald heads will not be without this article, which gives in every instance, entire setisfaction.

CAUTION.

Don't let any druggist or dealer urge upon you a different article, as there is no preparation in the world like this. Beware of any article purporting to be the same.

Try HALL'S HAIR RENEWER according to Directions, and you will use no other.

If not sold at druggists in your town, a trial bottle will be sent you by express, upon receipt of one dollar by mail, thus giving you an opportunity at once of testing its excellent qualities.

Orders for trial bottles must be addressed to

TOTAL ECLIPSE OF THE MOON.—March is to close out as did January, with nights made beautiful by a full moon.—The almanac tells us that on the evening of March 30th, there will be a total eclipse of the moon. The time will be very favorable for observations, as it begins at 5 minutes past 9 o'clock, is at its total at 12 minutes past 10 and begins to disappear at 51 minutes past 11. It is visible throughout the United States.

☞ A man named McAbrey, on Monday evening of last week drove into Mr. Cregor's cattle yards at Adrian, three head of cattle, which, it afterwards appeared, had been stolen from a gentleman living north of Tecumseh. McAbrey managed to escape, but it is hoped that he may yet be captured. There has been a carnival of cattle and hog stealing in this vicinity of late, and it is hoped some clue to the perpetrators of the robberies may be obtained through this last transaction.

☞ A man named Joseph Daykins, was arrested in the township of Cambridge on Monday, on complaint of Joseph Arner. It appears that Mr. Arner is Treasurer, of Cambridge, and that Daykins came to his house to pay taxes.—After Daykins had gone away Mr. Arner missed his poket book, and, suspecting that Daykins had taken it, went to his house thereof. At first Daykins denied any knowledge of the missing pocket book, but upon being told by Mr. Arner that his (Arner's) children had seen him take it, he went into his sleeping room and soon returned with it saying that he had put it under his pillow after return from Mr. Arner's supposing it to be his own.

Daykins has been required to give $1,000 bail for his appearance for trial at the next term of court.

A Love Story.

"The course of true love never did run smoothe" is an adage both old and true, and a very striking illustration of this principle occurred in this village not many months ago. The good people of Tecumseh, like most other communities are divided into two classes, those who spark and those who do not. The hero and heroine of our story belong to the first class A worthy young man, of prepossessing appearance, good moral, and unmarried saw fit, as many other young men do, to attend some evening meetings that have been held at one of our churches for some weeks past, and during the brief run of sleighing we were favored with a short time since, he very wisely decided to go to meeting with his horse and cutter rather than on foot. One evening a friend of his desired the loan of his horse and cutter for a short time to test the sleighing, and with great self denial, our hero Mr A.—B.—kindly granted him the favor, although he was compelled in the mean time to accompany one of the unmarried sisters home to seek shelter from the wintry storms until his friends return, but he took the precaution to direct his friend when he came back, to hitch the horse under the church shed and blanket him well. After these preliminary arrangements, A.—B.—kindly escorted Miss——to her father's residence not many blocks distant from the church.—Upon their arrival a fire was soon kindled in the "front room" and our young friends sat themselves down with great resignation to patiently await the arrival of the horse and sleigh. Now it so happened that Miss——had a brother just in his "teens" who for convenience we will call John, and John for some unaccountable cause exhibited a peculiar and unusual attachment for the parlor that evening Upon disccovering this A.—B.—with his usual self denial quietly told John to go down to the church shed, and if he found a horse and cutter there to take them and "go in." John of course, needed no second hint and he was off in a trice, found horse and cutter, and in less time than it takes to relate it, was flying along behind the merry bells. But alas, there is many a slip twixt the cup and the lip. Now A.—B.—'s friend as A.—B.—himself expected, had not yet returned with his horse, but it chanced that some careful farmer had driven a horse and cutter under the same shed during the evening and it was the farmer's horse that John had found and made free with, supposing it to be his brother in-law's, in future. To make a long story short, the farmer soon after John's departure, came for his sleigh and found it missing, supposed it had been stolen, dispatched an officer and two or three other men in different directions to overhaul the thief, one of whom found John wrapped up in the Buffalo robes as innocent as a lamb in clover, and rather unceremoniously brought him back.—John soon explained the matter however, A.—B.—paid a round sum of "hush money" and the farmer went on his way rejoicing, while A.—B.—went home that night a wiser and poorer man.

THE PROPOSED POSTAGE LAW.—One of the most senseless and injurious measures ever introduced before Congress is that requiring the postage on regular papers to be paid at the office of publication. The Elmira Advertiser sensibly remarks that if Congress desires to blot out the country press from the face of the earth, and to give to New York papers yet greater advantages than they now enjoy, let them adopt this plan. It will do it effectually. The plan will work no good to the Government, and only evil for the country press. If the Post Office Committee, or the Post Master General, had a practical knowledge of the newspaper business such an absurd and impracticable proposition would not gain a foothold for a moment.

A LARGE BUSINESS.—During the year 1865 the Old Phœnix Insurance Co. of Hartford issued 47,296 policies covering property to the amount of $60,577-851,00 and paid for fire losses exclusively, the sum of $410,613,51. The Phœnix is now the leading fire company in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Missouri, Tennessee, Mississippi, California and Oregon, and ranks as second only in Michigan. Insure with the Phœnix.—
S. C. STACY, Agent.

☞ There are some of our subscribers who have never paid us a cent since we commenced publishing the 'Herald.' To those we would say, we must have our money or we shall place the accounts in an officers hands for collection immediately. A word to the wise is sufficient.

For the Tecumseh Herald.

From the South.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., Jan. 18th, 1866.

The war, having changed the entire condition of the south, politically as well as socially, and in many instances its commercial and agricultural interest are diverted into new channels, with new workers and thinkers, who of course have new ideas with regard to the business relation of the South. Therefore anything regarding these changes must be read with some interest by the people of the Northern States. Committees and correspondents and 'Freedman's Beureaus' are traveling everywhere through this once rebellious country, watching the result of all these great changes, and transferring their observations, to the departments at Washington, and the papers at home.

The Freedman is the great bone of contention here, and the source of many evils. It is hard to realize that the Negro is free, and has now the right and opportunities to learn to read and write, the same as those who formerly held them in bondage, but of one thing we may be sure, their condition can never be improved except by some education and a religious influence, which the people of the south, more particularly the Bishop and Clergy, are now using their influence to bring about by establishing Colored Orphan Asylums or schools The blacks here, or a majority of them, are very profane, as well as dishonest, although some of them are very good house servants. But I have not yet heard one of them speak unkindly of their old masters. They are naturally very indolent, but most of them, if they have any comforts at all now, have to work much harder than ever before, still they are very happy over their freedom.

When the people of the south have recovered by industry what they lost by the war, and when they again find themselves in a condition to possess some of the luxuries of life, which heretofore they have been accustomed to the vindictive and rebellious spirit which they formerly manifested in many localities, will undoubtedly disappear

The one great thing needed here is education, or the means of procuring it cheap. Tennessee is wofully destitute of schools, there is not in this whole State a single school that Michigan would consider worthy of the name, and yet the people are unwilling to admit any deficiency in this regard and are consequently slow in adopting measures for improvement.

The resources of this State are equal to almost any in the Union, and the great influx of Northern capital and Northern energy and ideas, will soon change the entire thoughts and feelings of the South There has been a great immigration from the North to this State since the war, "and still they come," and all find homes and something to do, there is a great demand for builders, shoemakers and mechanics of all kinds, and laborers also. Preparations are now being made to put up some 3000 buildings, in this city, next year.

Memphis is situated on the highest bluff, on the Mississippi river, between St. Louis and New Orleans, which gives it the name of "Bluff City," and is 500 miles from the former and 600 from the latter place, with which it is connected by a railroad. The white population numbers some 70,000, and it is thought about 40,000 negroes.

Mrs D G Q

Sleighing.

Almost at the eleventh hour we are favored with a "run" of splendid sleighing. Saturday evening last, just after the sun had completed his daily round, the flakes of snow began to fall and they chased each other with merry glee faster and faster down, until, on the Sabbath morning the whole face of the landscape was clothed in a garment of crystal white.

How appropriate then were the beautiful lines of Mrs. Hale:

Gently as lillies shed their leaves,
Where summer days are fair,
The feathery snow comes floating down
Like blossoms on the air;
And o'er the world like angels wing
Unfolding soft and white,
It broods above the brown, sere earth
And fills, with forms of light
The dead and desolate domain
Where Winter holds his iron reign

"The tintinnabulation of the merry merry bells" have greeted our ears ever since. Both farmers and villagers, rich and poor, old and young, appear determined to improve the sleighing while it lasts.

A Curiosity.

Mr. Cleveland, residing in this place, lately showed us quite a curiosity in the newspaper line. It was a newspaper published in Kingston N. Y. by Samuel Freer & Son in January 1800 and called the Ulster county Gazette. It was a sixteen column sheet and was about ten by eighteen inches in size, printed in the old style of type with the long s and upon course paper. It contained an account of the funeral of Gen. Washington, the resolution of the Senate and house of Representatives in relation to Washington's death, their presentation to President Adams and his reply, an original dirge written by a young lady for the Gazette upon Washington's death, latest foreign news, advertisements &c. It contains no editorial articles. It was found by the owner last summer in a bundle of paper rags but will now doubtles be preserved.

New Tannery.

We understand that Messrs. Emlay & Courter are about building a new tannery on a site just South of Barker's tannery across Evans' Creek, on Maumee street, which will be worth when finished not far from ten thousand dollars. We wish them success in their undertaking. Nothing serves to build up a town like manufacturing establishments, and as the towns around us are alive to their interests in this respect, we should not be behind them. In this connection we would suggest that Tecumseh is a splendid location for a first class Woolen Factory. Will not our men of means look to this?—There is a project now on foot to build a large Woolen Factory in the village of Clinton, and if Clinton can afford an institution of that kind, most assuredly we can. We have been asleep for the past few years. Let us now wake up. The new tannery is expected to be ready for occupation by the 1st of July next and we hope that this may be the "entering wedge" to many improvements of the same kind.

The Glass Blowers.

Milligans' troupe of glass blowers closed their entertainments on Saturday evening last. They were very popular during their stay here, and well they might be, for their exhibitions are well worthy the patronage of every one. They gave away many dollars worth of beautiful and costly presents, and on Saturday afternoon they went into the wholesale trade in that line. On Friday evening a prize was awarded to the homliest man in the audience, and on Saturday evening to the most beautiful lady. They went from here to Adrian where they will remain during the present week.

Died.

Feb. 5th, 1866 of Diptheria, FRANCIS H., son of Henry and Jane Wilson, aged 3 yrs. and 3 mos.

Thou art gone dear boy, gone to thy rest,
As some sweet dove, that seeks its mothers' nest,
And thou hast found a home above the clouds of even,
In that sweet land of flowers a happy heaven.

In Tecumseh on Jan. 30th, of Diptheria, WILLIAM, son of Robert and Mary J. Boyd, aged 12 years, 7 months and six days.

On the 6th inst., of Diptheria, ADDIE B., daughter of Robert and Mary J. Boyd, aged 2 years, 1 month and 5 days.

☞ The following question will be discussed before the Union Lyceum on Monday evening next. Resolved that the passage by Congress of a Bill granting the right of suffrage to the negroes in the district of Columbia was untimely and impolitic.

A Big Pile.

The old Phœnix of Hartford paid in losses during the year 1865 the sum of $410,613.31 and paid every loss promptly. It has paid $67,057 in lossess in the state of Michigan alone. It's total assests now amount to over one million dollars. All who desires first class reliable insurance should insure with the Phœnix.

☞ The committee of the Board of Supervisors appointed to settle with the bail of the Hudson Treasurer, who was made a defaulter through the Treadwell swindle, effected a compromise last week, the gentleman who were his sureties paying 50 per cent of the claim, which amounted to something over $6,000.

THE GREAT WEST.—Homes of the sturdy farmers who look about them over the broad prairies, and see for miles their granaries, are often rendered desolate by the death of a beloved child from the ravages of the deadly croup. Coe's Cough Balsam never fails to cure it, and is also the best remedy in the world for colds, coughs, and all throat and lung diseases.

Coe's Dyspepsia Cure is the only remedy known that is certain to cure Dyspepsia Indigestion, and in fact all disorders proceeding from the stomach and bowels.

He had eloped to Pittsburgh with this girl of seventeen years of age, on the 19th of December, 1864. They were married on the following day, and he was arrested on the 21st on the charge of adultery and bigamy, was tried, sentenced to the penitentiary for one year, but was pardoned out in five or six months. He returned in May, 1865, and visited Tamzen's father's house on the 24th of July, for the purpose of inducing her to live with him. On her refusal to comply, he shot her dead, in Bedford village. On the 9th of August he was arrested,—indicted, tried, convicted and sentenced on the 30th of December last to suffer the extreme penalty of the law. He made a twenty minutes' speech on the scaffold, denouncing Moses as the greatest murderer in history, and his law not God's law. He said there was no sense in murdering him. He did not believe that Christ was the son of God, &c. He was killed instantly by the fall—six feet two inches. Not a muscle moved in the act. Some two hundred persons were present in the jail, and a crowd of perhaps a thousand blocked up the jail gates and filled the adjacent streets. Sunday night the body-snatchers attempted to "resurrect" the body of a young lady who had been buried that afternoon; and succeeded beyond their anticipations. She had been buried while in a cataleptic fit, and upon being exposed to the night air animation was restored. The resurrectionists fled and she walked home. Her parents refused to admit her, believing her to be a ghost. She then went to the house of a young man to whom she was engaged. He took her in, and on Monday morning they were married.

THE FREEDMEN AND THE PRESIDENT.

WASHINGTON, February 7.

The delegation of colored representatives from different States of the country, now in Washington, to urge the interests of the colored people before the Government, had an interview with the President this afternoon. The delegation was as follows: Fred. Douglass, of New York; Geo. T. Downing, representing the New England States; Lewis H. Douglass, son of Fred. Douglass; William E. Matthews, of Maryland; John Jones, of Illinois; John F. Cook, of District Columbia; A. J. Raynor, of South Carolina; Jos. E. Oats, of Florida; A. W. Ross, of Mississippi; Wm. Rippon, of Pennsylvania; Jno. M. Grovin, Alex. Dunlop and Calvin White, of Virginia. The President shook hands kindly with each member of the delegation, Fred. Douglass first advancing for that purpose.

Geo. F. Downing then addressed the President as follows: "We present ourselves to your Excellency to make known with pleasure the respect which we cherish for you, a respect which is your due as Chief Magistrate. It is our desire for you to know that we come feeling that we are friends meeting friends. We should, however, have manifested our friendship by not coming to further tax your already much burdened and valuable time, but we have another object in calling. We are in a passage to equality before the law. God hath made it by opening a Red Sea; we would have your assistance through the same. We come to you in the name of the United States, and are delegated to come by some who have unjustly worn the manacles on their bodies; by some whose minds have been manacled by class legislation in States called free. The colored people of the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New York, New England States, and the District of Columbia, have specially delegated us to come. Our coming is a marked circumstance, noting determined hope, and that we are not satisfied with an amendment prohibiting slavery, but that we wish it enforced with appropriate legislation. This is our desire. We ask for it intelligently, with the knowledge and conviction that the fathers of the Revolution intended freedom for every American citizen, and that they all should be protected in their rights as citizens equal before the law. We are Americans, native born. We are glad to have it known to the world as bearing no doubtful record on this point. On this fact, and with confidence in the triumph of justice, we base our hopes. We see no recognition of race or color in the organized law of the land. It knows no privileged class, and therefore all cherish the hope that we may be fully franchised, not only in this District, but throughout the land. We respectfully submit that rendering anything else than this would be rendering to us less than our just due, that granting anything less than our full rights will be a disregard of our just rights and of due respect for our feelings. If the powers that be do so, it will be used as a license, as it were, or an apology for any community or for individuals thus disposed, to outrage our rights and feelings. It has been shown in the present war that the Government may justly reach the strong arm into the States and demand from those who owe allegiance their assistance and support. May it not reach out a like arm to secure and protect its subjects upon whom it has a claim?"

Frederick Douglass advanced and addressed the President, saying:

"Mr. President, we are not here to enlighten you, Sir, as to your duties as Chief Magistrate of this Republic, but to show our respect and to present in brief the claims of our race to your favorable consideration. In the order of Divine Providence, you are placed in a position where you have power to save or destroy us, to bless or blast us—I mean our whole race. Your noble and humane predecessor placed in our hands the sword to assist in saving the nation, and we do hope that you, his able successor, will favorably regard placing in our hands the ballot with which to save ourselves. We shall submit no argument on that point. The fact that we are the subjects of the Government and subject to taxation, to volunteer in the service of the country, subject to being drafted, and subject to bear the burdens of the State, makes it not improper that we should ask to share in the privileges of the condition. I have no speech to make on this occasion. I simply submit these observations as a limited expression of the views and feelings of the delegation with which I have come."

THE PRESIDENT'S REPLY.

The following is substantially the response of the President:

"In reply to some of your inquiries, not to make a speech about this matter—for it is always best to talk plainly and distinctly about such questions—I will say that if I have not given evidence in my former course that I am a friend to humanity, and to that portion of it which constitutes the colored population, I can give no evidence hereafter. Everything that I have had, both as regards life and property, has been periled in this cause, and I feel and think that I understand, not to be egotistic, what should be the true direction of this question, and what course of policy would result in the amelioration and ultimate elevation not only of the colored but of the great mass of the people of the United States. I say that if I have not given evidence that I am a friend of humanity, and especially a friend of the colored man, in my past conduct, there is nothing that I can do that would; I repeat, all that I possessed—life, liberty, and property—have been put in connection with that question, when I had every inducement held out to take the other course, by adopting which I would have accomplished all that the most ambitious could have desired.

If I know myself and the feeling of my own heart, they have been for the colored man. I have owned slaves and bought slaves, but I never, never sold one. I might say, however, that practically, so far as my connection with slaves has gone, I have been their slave instead of their being mine. Some have even followed me here, while others are occupying and enjoying my property with my consent. For the colored race my means, my time, my all, have been perilled, and now, at this late day, after giving evidence that is tangible, and that is practical, I am free to say that I do not like to be arraigned by some who can get up handsomely rounded periods, and deal in rhetoric, and talk about abstract ideas of liberty, who never periled life, liberty, or property. This kind of theoretical, hollow friendship amounts to but very little. While I say that I am a friend to the colored race, I do not want to adopt a policy that I believe will end, in a contest between the races, which, if persisted in, will result in the extermination of one or the other. God forbid that I should be engaged in such work now.

It is always best to talk practically and in a common sense way. I have said, and I repeat here, that if the colored men in the United States could find no other Moses, nor any Moses that would be more able and efficient than myself, I would be their Moses to lead them from bondage to freedom; that I would pass them from a land where they had lived in slavery to a land, if it were in our reach, of freedom. I would be willing to pass with them through the Red Sea to the land of promise, to the land of liberty.

But I am not willing, under either circumstance, to adopt a policy which I believe would only result in the sacrifice of his life and shedding of his blood. I think I know what I say. I feel what I say, and I feel assured that if the policy urged by some be persisted in, it will result in great injury to the white as well as to the colored man. There is a great deal of talk about the sword in one hand accomplishing an end, and the ballot accomplishing another at the ballot box. These things are all very well, and sometimes have forcible application. We talk about justice. We talk about right. We say that the white man has been wrong in keeping the black in slavery as long as he has. That is all true. Again, we talk about the Declaration of Independence and equality before the law. You understand all that, and know how to appreciate it; but now let us look each other in the face. Let us go to the great mass of colored men throughout the slave States. Let us take the condition in which they are at the present time, and it is bad enough. We all know and suppose by some magic touch you could say to every one, You shall vote to-morrow. How much would that ameliorate their condition at this time?

Now let us get closer up to the subject, and talk about it. What relation has the colored man and the white man heretofore occupied in the South? I opposed slavery on two grounds; First, It was a great monopoly, enabling those who controlled it to constitute an aristocracy, enabling the few to derive great profits, and rule the many with an iron rod, as it were, and that is one great objection to it in a government—its being a monopoly. I was opposed to it upon the abstract principle that in getting clear of a monopoly we were getting clear of slavery at the same time. So you see there were two ends accomplished in the accomplishment of the one.

Mr. DOUGLAS—Mr. President do you wish—

The PRESIDENT—I am not quite through. Yet slavery has been abolished; a great national guarantee has been given—one that cannot be revoked. I was getting at the relation that existed between the white man and the colored man. A very small proportion of white persons, compared with the whole number of such, owned the colored people of the South. Let us talk about this matter as it is. Although the colored man was in slavery there, and owned as property in the sense and language of that community, yet in comparing his condition and his position with the non-slaveholder, he usually estimated his importance and his position just in proportion to the number of slaves that his master owned, with the non-slaveholder. Have you ever lived on a plantation?

Mr. DOUGLAS—I have, your Excellency.

The PRESIDENT—When you would look over and see a man who had a large family struggling hard upon a poor piece of land, you thought a great deal less of him than you did of your own master?

Mr. DOUGLASS—Not I.

The PRESIDENT—Well, I know such was the case with a large majority of you in those sections. We know there is an enmity. We know there is a hate. The poor white man on the other hand, was opposed to the slave and his master, for the colored man and his master combined to keep him in slavery, by depriving him of a fair participation in the labor and productions of the rich lands of the country. Don't you know that the colored man, in going to hunt a master, as they call it, for the next year, preferred hiring to a man who owned slaves rather than to one who did not? I know the fact at all events.

Mr. DOUGLASS—Because they treated him better.

The PRESIDENT—They did not consider it quite as respectable to hire to a man who did not own negroes as one who did.

Mr. DOUGLASS—Because he would not be treated as well.

The PRESIDENT—Then that is another argument in favor of what I am going to say. It shows that the colored man appreciated the slaveowner more highly than he did the man who did not own slaves. Hence the enmity between the colored man and the non-slaveholders. The white man was permitted to vote, for the government was derived from him. He is a part and parcel of the political machinery now, by rebellion or revolution, and should you come back to the objects of this war, you will find that the abolition of slavery was not one of its objects. Congress and the President declared that it was our part to suppress the rebellion. Abolition of slavery has given us an incident to the suppression of a great rebellion. The colored man went into this rebellion a slave. By the operation of rebellion he came out a freedman equal to a free man in other portions of the country. There is a great deal done for him on this point, the man slaveholder who was forced into the rebellion was as loyal as those that lived beyond the limits of the rebellion. In numbers of instances the lives of such were sacrificed, and he who has survived has come out of it with nothing gained, but a great deal lost. Now, upon a principle of justice, should they be placed in a condition different from that which they were before? On the one hand, one has gained a great deal; on the other hand, one has lost a great deal and in a political point of view, scarcely stands where he did before.

Now we have got at the trade that existed between the two races. The query comes up whether these two races, situated as they were before, without preparation, without time for passion and excitement, and without time for the slightest improvment, whether the one should be turned loose upon the other and be thrown together at the ballot-box with this enmity and hate existing between them. The query then comes up, will we not then commence a war of races? I think I understand this thing: and especially is this the case when you force it upon a people without their consent. You have spoken about government. Where is the power derived from? We say it is derived from the people. Let us take it so and refer to the District of Columbia by way of illustration.

Suppose, for instance, here, in this political comunity, which, to ascertain the point must have government, must have law, and putting now upon the broadest basis you can put it, take into consideration the relation which the white has heretofore borne to the colored race, is it proper to force upon this community without their consent, the elective franchise, without regard, color, making it universal?

Now where do you begin. Government must have a controlling power, must have a lodgement. For instance suppose congress shall pass authorizing an election to be held at which all over 21 years of age, without regard to color, should be allowed to vote and a majority should decide at such an election that the elective franchise should be universal, what would you do about it? Who would settle it? Do you deny that the first great principle is the right of the people to govern themselves? Will you resort to an arbitrary power and say a majority of the people shall receive a state of things they are opposed to?"

Mr. DOUGLASS—That was said before the war?"

The PRESIDENT—I am now talking about a principle, not about what somebody said.

Mr. DOWNING—"Apply what you have said, Mr. President, to South Carolina, for instance.

The PRESIDENT—"Suppose you go to South Carolina or to Ohio, that does not change the principle at all. The query to which I have referred still comes up. The government commenced upon this principle and has existed upon it, and now you propose to incorporate an element that did not exist before in it, I say the query comes. In undertaking this thing whether we have a right to make a change in regard to the elective franchise, in Ohio, for instance; or whether we shall not let the people in that state decide the matter for themselves. Each community is better prepared to determine the depository of political power than any body else; and it is for the legislature, or the people of Ohio to say, who shall vote or not for the congress of the United States. I might go down to the ballot-box to-morrow and vote directly for universal suffrage, but if a great majority of this people said "no," I should consider it would be tyrannical and arbitrary in me to attempt to force it upon them without their will. It is a fundamental point in my creed that the will of the people must be obeyed when fairly expressed. Is there anything wrong or unfair in that?"

Mr. DOUGLASS, smiling—"A great deal wrong, Mr. President, with all respect."

The PRESIDENT—"The people must determine that for themselves. I do not want to be engaged in work that will commence a war of races. In each community, if a man demeans himself well, and shows that the new state of affairs will operate well, he will be protected in all his rights, and given every possible advantage by that community. When they have been reconciled socially and politically to certain things, then will this new order of affairs work harmoniously, but, forced upon the people before they are prepared for it, it will be resisted and work inharmoniously. I feel a conviction that forcing that matter upon the people, upon the community, will result in the injury of both races and the ruin of one or the other. God knows I have no desire but for the good of the whole human race. I would it were so that all you advocate could be done in the twinkling of an eye; but it is not in the nature of things, and I do not pretend to be wiser than Providence or stronger than the laws of nature.

"Let us now seek to discover the laws governing this question. There is a great law controlling it; let us endeavor to find out what that law is, and conform our action to it; all the details will then properly adjust themselves and work well in the end. God knows that anything I can do in the mighty process by which the great end is to be reached, anything I can do to elevate the races, to soften and ameliorate their condition, I will do; and to be able to do so is the sincere desire of my heart. I am glad to have met and thank you for the compliments you have paid me."

Mr. DAYTON—"I have to return you our thanks, Mr. President, for so kindly granting us this interview. We did not come here expecting to argue this question with your excellency, but simply to state what were our views and wishes in the premises. If we were disposed to argue the question, and you would grant us permission, of course we would endeavor to controvert some of the points you have assumed."

Mr. DOWNING—"Mr. Douglas, I take it that the president, by his kind expressions and his very full treatment of the subject, must have contemplated some reply to the views which he has advanced and in which we certainly do not concur, and I say this with due respect."

The PRESIDENT—"I thought you expected me to indicate to some extent what my views were on the subject touched in your statement."

Mr. DOWNING—"We are very happy indeed to have heard them."

Mr. DOUGLASS—"If the president will allow me I would like to say one or two words in reply."

The PRESIDENT—"All I have done is simply to indicate what my views are as I supposed you expected me to favor your address."

Mr. DOUGLASS—"My own impression is that the very thing your excellency would avoid in southern states can only be avoided by the very measure that we propose, and I would state to my brother delegates that because I perceive the President has taken strong ground in favor of a given policy, and distrusting my own ability to remove any of those impressions which he has expressed, I thought we had better end this interview with the expression of thanks, [addressing the President] and if your excellency will be pleased to hear, I would like to say a word or two in regard to that one matter of the enfranchisement of the blacks as a means of preventing everything which your excellency seems to apprehend, that is, a conflict of races?"

The PRESIDENT—"I repeat I merely want to indicate my views in reply to your address, and not to enter into any general controversy, and I could not well do so under the circumstances. Your statement was a very frank one, and I thought it was due to you to meet it in the same spirit."

Mr. DOUGLASS—"Thank you sir."

The PRESIDENT—I think you will find so far as the south is concerned that it will."

SLIGHT OF UMBRELLA.—Mons. Hermann gave his last audience in Dayton a specimen of "slight of hand" not in the bills. The chief objection to it was that the striking feature was not visible to the public. He was about to show how a lady's handkerchief could be rent into strips and be returned in perfect condition. A lady lent her handkerchief for the purpose, and Hermann's assistant deliberately tore it to pieces—to all appearances. Meantime Hermann had seized an umbrella for the purpose of showing that there was no handkerchief inside. Unfortunately the assistant had given him the wrong umbrella. The audience greeted the faux pas with shouts of laughter. The dismayed assistant rushed off the stage, pursued by the hot prestidigitateur. Directly the curtain went down, and a series of blows were heard. There seemed to be a fight behind the scenes. Some of the ladies in the audience were frightened, but the gentlemen thought it rather a good joke, though disappointed at losing that part of the exhibition. After considerable delay the curtain rose again, and Hermann, considerably agitated, proceeded with the show. It leaked out yesterday that when the show man rushed off the stage, Hermann lammed his unlucky assistant with the umbrella until it was disabled for all future "slight of hand" performances. The assistant professed regret for his slack performance, and Hermann declared he was "Never so mooch mortify in his life," adding, "If I have been in New York I shall have shoote myself, I so much mortify." The lady received her handkerchief after the performance.—Dayton Journal, Jan. 27.

THE NEW CRIME OF "MUZZLING."—These "muzzlers" stand on corners, as a general thing. They are separated and apparently skylarking among themselves. Suddenly one of them falls down and rolls himself against the pedestrian, who also must fall. The other confederate is soon on the top of the latter, when he is down, and as quick as flash places his hand upon his face, presses his nostrils together with his thumb and forefinger, and covers his mouth with his hand. His cries are thus stifled, and the unfortunate pedestrian is almost smothered. While this is done by one, the others go through the man's pockets and rifle them of their contents. This takes some three or four minutes, during which time the victim's breath is shut off. When the muzzlers get through, the victim is so used up, exhausted and unconscious that he is unable to give an alarm, let alone pursue the robbers. He is obliged to lay there a few minutes until he recovers himself, which allows the muzzlers an opportunity to escape.—Albany (N. Y.) Knickerbocker.

CAUGHT.—The legislature of Oregon during its last session passed an act compelling barber-shops to close business at 10 o'clock A. M. on Sundays. This has given rise to many practical jokes; among the best is this: A few Sundays since the governor of the state stepped into a barber-shop about 9:50 A. M., and placed himself in a chair to be shaved, at the same time giving his boots to the boy to polish. The barber lathered his excellency's face, the boy brushed on his boots. About the time one half the executive beard was shorn, and one boot satisfactorily polished, the clock struck 10. The brush dropped from the boy's hand and the barber began hastily to place his instruments on the shelf. The governor desired him to proceed. Can't do it, Mr. Gibbs; the Sunday law is in force, was the reply. And in spite of his protestations, the governor was obliged to leave with one side of his face unshaved and one boot covered with dust.

With many a curve my banks I fret,
By many a gold and fallow,
And many a fairy fore-land set
With willow, weed and mallow.
I slip, I slide, I gleam, I glance
Among my skimming swallows;
I make the nettled sunbeams dance
Against my sandy shallows—
I chatter—chatter as I flow
To join the brimming river,
For men may come, and men may go,
But I go on forever—ever—I go on forever!

I wind about and in and out,
With here a blossom sailing;
And here and there a lusty trout,
And here and there a grayling;
And here and there a snowy flake
Upon me as I travel;
With many a silver water-break
Above the snowy gravel;
And out again I curve and flow
To join the brimming river,
For men may come, and men may go,
But I go on forever—ever—I go on forever!

I steal by lawns and grassy plots,
I slide by hazel covers;
I move the sweet forget-me-nots
That grow for happy lovers;
I murmur under moon and stars,
In brambly wildernesses,
I linger by my shingly bars,
I loiter round my cresses—
And out again I curve and flow
To join the brimming river,
For men may come, and men may go,
But I go on forever—ever—I go on forever!

Horace Greeley's Ride to Placerville.

[From Artemus Ward's Travels in California.]

When Horace Greeley was in California ovations awaited him at every town. He had written powerful leaders in the N. Y. Tribune in favor the Pacific railroad, which had greatly endeared him to the citizens of the golden State. And therefore they made much of him when he went to see them.

At one town the enthusiastic populace tore his celebrated white coat to pieces, and carried the pieces home to remember him by.

The citizens of Placerville prepared to fete the great journalist, and an extra coach, with extra relays of horses, was chartered of the California Stage Company to carry him from Folsom to Placerville—distance forty miles. The extra was on some account delayed, and did not leave Folsom until late in the afternoon. Mr. Greeley was to be feted at 7 o'clock that evening at Placerville, and it was altogether necessary that he should be there by that hour. So the Stage Company said to Henry Monk, the driver of the extra, "Henry, this great man must be there by 7 o'clock to-night." And Henry answered, "the great man shall be there."

The roads were in an awful state, and during the first few miles out of Folsom, very slow progress was made.

"Sir," said Mr. Greeley, are you aware that I must be at Placerville at 7 o'clock to-night?"

"I've got my orders!" laconically returned Henry Monk.

Still the coach dragged slowly forward.

"Sir," said Mr. Greeley, "this is not a trifling matter. I must be there at seven!"

Again came the answer, "I've got my orders!"

But the speed was not increased, and Mr. Greeley chafed away another half hour, when, as he was again about to remonstrate with the driver, the horses suddenly started into a furious run, and all sorts of encouraging yells filled the air from the throat of Henry Monk.

"That is right my good fellow!" said Mr. Greeley, "I'll give you ten dollars when we get to Placerville. Now we are going!"

They were, indeed, and at a terrible speed.

Crack, crack! went the whip, and again "that voice" split the air. "Git up! Hi—yi! G'long! Yip—yip!"

And on they tore, over ruts and stones, up hill and down, at a rate of speed never achieved by stage horses.

Mr. Greeley, who had been bouncing from one end of the stage to the other, like an India rubber ball, managed to get his head out of the window, when he said—

"D—on't—on't you—u-u-u think we-e-e shall get there by seven if we do-on't-on't go so fast?"

"I've got my orders!" That was all Henry Monk said. And on tore the coach.

It was becoming serious. Already the journalist was becoming extremely sore from the terrible jolting, and again his head "might have been seen at the window."

"Sir," he said, "I don't care—care—are, if we don't get there at seven!"

"I have got my orders!"

Fresh horses; forward again faster than before; over rocks and stumps; on one which the coach narrowly escaped turning a summerset.

"See here!" shrieked Mr. Greeley, "I don't care if we don't get there at all!"

"I've got my orders! I work for the California Stage Company, I do. That's wot I work for. They said 'git this man through by seving.' An' this man's agoin' through. You bet! G'long! Whoo-op!"

Another frightful jolt, and Mr. Greeley's bald head suddenly found its way through the roof of the coach, amidst the crash of small timbers and the ripping of strong canvass.

"Stop, you—maniac!" he roared.

Again answered Henry Monk—

"I've got my orders! Keep your seat, Horace!"
